LINDLEY, L.J.—The judgment against the validity of the preference shares is based upon the well-known case of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., which came twice before Kindersley, V.-C., and which Kekewich, J. very naturally held to be binding on him. Kindersley, V.-C.'s first decision was that a limited company which had not issued the whole of its original capital could not issue the unallotted shares as preference shares unless authorised so to do by its memorandum of association or by its articles of association. This decision was affirmed on appeal, and was obviously correct; and would have been correct even if the whole of the original capital had been issued and the preference shares had been new and original capital. The company, however, afterwards passed a special resolution, altering the articles and authorising an issue of preference shares. This raised an entirely different question, and led to the second decision reported in 2 Dr. & S. 521. The V.-C. granted an injunction restraining the issue of the preference shares, and he held distinctly that the resolution altering the articles was ultra vires. He did so upon the ground, as we understand his judgment, that there was in the memorandum of association a condition that all the shareholders should stand on an equal footing as to the receipts of dividends, and that this condition was one which could not be got rid of by a special resolution altering the articles of association under the powers conferred by sects. 50 and 51 of the Act. The judgment of the V.-C. is a little obscure, because he treats the condition as a condition of the constitution of the company, and he may have meant by that expression, either the constitution as fixed by the memorandum of association, or the constitution as fixed by the memorandum of association and the original articles. But unless he had meant the constitution of the company as fixed by the memorandum of association, his decision is unintelligible: for, so far as the constitution depended on the articles, it clearly could be altered by special resolution under the powers conferred by sects. 50 and 51 of the Companies Act, 1862. A company cannot deprive itself of this power (see Malleson v. National Insurance and Guarantee Corporation and Walker v. London Tramways Co.). The V.-C. further seems to have been of opinion that the condition could be excluded by contemporaneous articles of association, and his decision has been so understood by succeeding judges. Accordingly, in 1875, in Harrison v. Merican Ry. (supra, col. 387), Sir G. Jessel held that the condition of equality imported into the memorandum of association by Kindersley, V.-C.'s decision was negated by one of the articles of association filed with the memorandum, which article authorised the creation of additional capital by the issue of new shares, "in such manner, to such amount, and with and subject to such rules, regulations, privileges, and conditions," as the company should think fit. In our opinion it is impossible to uphold this decision, or the view of Kindersley, V.-C. himself, as to the effect of articles on the memorandum, if it is once conceded that it is a condition in the memorandum of association that there should be equality amongst the shareholders. If the condition is really one of the conditions of the memorandum, it is immaterial whether the condition is express or implied. If the memorandum of association really prescribed equality amongst all the shareholders, as Kindersley, V.-C. held that it did, the articles of association could not override the memorandum of association in that particular (see sect. 12 of the Act, and Ashbury Railway Carriage Co. v. Riche (1875) 44 L. J. Ex. 185; L. R. 7 H. L. 653 (post, col. 441); and Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland (supra, col. 387)). The departure thus made by Sir G. Jessel from the principle on which the V.-C. based the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. was sanctioned by the C. A. in 1885 in South Durham Brewery Co., In re, and again in 1887 in the Bridgewater Navigation Co. (post, col. 571)—a case, which, although reversed on another point [Birch v. Cropper (1889) 59 L. J. Ch. 122; 14 App. Cas. 525; post, col. 572] was not questioned on the point now under consideration. These decisions turned upon the principle that although by sect. 8 of the Act the memorandum is to state the amount of the original capital and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, yet in other respects the rights of the shareholders in respect of their shares and the terms on which additional capital may be raised, are matters to be regulated by the articles of association rather than by the memorandum, and are, therefore, matters which (unless provided for by the memorandum, as in Ashbury v. Watson (supra, col. 388)), may be determined by the company from time to time by special resolution pursuant to sect. 50 of the Act. This view, however, clearly negatives the doctrine that there is a condition in the memorandum of association that all shareholders are to be on an equality unless the memorandum itself shows the contrary. That proposition is, in our opinion, unsound. Its unsoundness was distinctly pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in British and American Trustee, &c. Corporation v. Couper (supra, col. 388). The view taken by Kindersley, V.-C. cannot, in our opinion, be supported by reference to the Companies Act of 1862; and it is inconsistent with the decisions to which we have referred, which, if wrong, can only now be set right by the H. L. It was, however, contended that this Court, at all events, had approved and followed the decisions of Kindersley, V.-C.; and Ashbury v. Watson was referred to on this point. In that case the memorandum of association stated that preferential shares might be created and what the preferential rights were to be; and it was held that these were conditions which could be properly introduced into the memorandum of association, and which, being introduced there, could not be afterwards departed from and be treated as articles of association capable of change. No doubt Fry, L.J., relied on Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. to show that provisions about preference shares were conditions which could properly be inserted in the memorandum of association; but the propriety of the decision of Kindersley, V.-C. in that case was not before the Court, and we do not regard Ashbury v. Watson as conflicting with any of the other decisions of the C. A., in which Kindersley, V.-C.'s decision has been judicially considered. . . . For the reasons, however, which we have given we are of opinion that the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. was wrong, and ought not to be followed—pp. 248–250.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Andrews v. Gas Meter Co. is an authority that, under sect. 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, a company's articles can be altered so as to authorise the issue of preference shares taking priority over existing shares, although no power to issue preference shares was conferred by the memorandum of association or by the original articles. . . . It was urged that a company's articles could not be altered retrospectively, and reliance was placed on Rigby, L.J.'s observations in James v. Buena Ventura, &c. Syndicate. The word "retrospective" is, however, somewhat ambiguous, and the concurrence of Rigby, L.J. in Andrews v. Gas Meter Co. shows that his observations in James v. Buena Ventura, &c. Syndicate are no authority for saying that existing rights, founded and dependent on alterable articles, cannot be affected by their alteration.—p. 272.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—But I think that we are all agreed that cases might occur in which a man might have acquired, by contract or otherwise, special rights against the company which would exclude him from the operation of the altered article. It is in this sense that I understand the observations of Rigby, L.J. in James v. Buena Ventura, &c. Syndicate.—p. 274.

STIRLING, J.—I think that the business of the company is the investment of the assets of the company in the limited class of securities mentioned in clause (c) of sect. 3 of the memorandum of association; in that respect I take the same view as that which I understand to have been expressed by Chitty, J. in Governments Stock Investment Co., In re. . . . It would seem from the note [of that case] contained in the Weekly Notes [Nov. (1891) 48], that Chitty, J. had expressed an adverse opinion with regard to the meaning of sub-clause (d) of sect. 1, sub-sect. 5 [Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890]; but examination of the full report of that case, and communication with the learned judge, have satisfied me that Chitty, J. expressed no opinion whatever upon this point. It was not seriously contended before him, probably because the facts did not afford a basis for the argument, that the alteration proposed in Governments Stock Investment Co., In re, fell within sub-clause (d), and Chitty, J., expressed no opinion on the matter one way or the other.—p. 399.

KEKEWICH, J.—In Foreign, &c. Trust Co., In re, Stirling, J., while confirming the alteration of the memorandum of association, expressed a strong opinion that the name of the company ought to be altered, because the name Foreign and Colonial Government Trust Company did not indicate to the public and to the persons dealing with the company, such an extension of the investments as was proposed. . . . Applying that to this marine insurance company, I say that persons dealing with this company under its existing name will not know that the company is undertaking these businesses of life, accident, and fire insurance. . . . I have been referred to several cases before Bristowe, V.-C., and one in Ireland, where marine insurance companies have enlarged their powers with the sanction of the Court, and apparently in those cases no such alteration was insisted on. I have looked to see what enlargements were made in those different cases, and I find that in some they were rather narrower than those submitted to me, but in some they were wider; and they were cases in which, according to my opinion, the name should have been altered. . . . It is not stated that Stirling, J.'s decision was before the other Courts, and having that decision before me . . . and indeed distinctly approving it, I ought not to allow the order for confirmation of the resolution to operate until the name has been altered.—p. 304.

CHITTY, J.—This application is a very different one from that which I refused when this Court presented its former petition. The proposed alterations are two. LINDLEY, M.R.—Ever since Eley v. Positive, &c. Assurance Co., which has been followed by a great number of other cases, it has been held that, when you come to look closely into this section [sect. 16 of the Companies Act, 1862], it does not mean that the articles are to be treated as agreements between the company on the one side and members on the other. I think that is pretty clearly established there. On the other hand, there are cases like Jaars' Case (post, col. 417), where it has been held that the articles are the terms upon which people can become members or directors, and the agreement may be got at partly through the articles, and partly through their conduct—that is also settled. They are agreements in a sense—there is no doubt about that. I do not understand now, and never did understand exactly, what the true effect of sect. 16 is, but I do understand this—that, having regard to the decisions beginning with Eley v. Positive, &c. Assurance Co., the company cannot sue the member and the member cannot sue the company, as if there were an agreement between the company on the one side and the member on the other.—p. 433. RIGBY and COLLINS, L.JJ., concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Now as regards the last-mentioned case [Lydney, &c. Co. v. Bird], although there are expressions which have been referred to by the appellants' counsel, and to which I stand, they have application of course to the circumstances of that case, and the circumstances of that case have not the slightest resemblance to the circumstances of the present case. The money there sought to be recovered was not money which was paid by the company for placing shares. There was a person named James Bird, who was a promoter of the company, and he secretly made a profit at the expense of the company of 10,800*l*. He was made liable for it. He said: "Well, but I have spent 5,000*l*. as a consideration, which I gave to William Bird for guaranteeing me that the shares should be taken up in this company," and we disallowed James Bird that bill. The whole thing was a juggle from beginning to end, and we disallowed it on the ground that it was an improper transaction, and so it was. It has nothing whatever to do with, and is far away and remote from, such a case as this, where there is no juggle and no impropriety at all. As regards Faure Electric Accumulator Co., In re, no doubt Kay, J. did apparently hold that these brokerage payments were illegal, being paid out of capital, certainly, and he made the directors there liable for them. If that decision is understood as going so far as to compel us to hold that these payments are illegal, I should say that I dissent from it, and it goes a great deal too far. I doubt very much, if you look at the facts, whether the L.J. did intend to go as far as that. I doubt whether he regarded the commissions there as ordinary commissions of a reasonable amount, payable in the ordinary course of business. I think he treated them rather as improper payments, rather in the shape of bribes; and of course, if he took that view, he was perfectly justified in holding the directors liable to replace the money which they had so misapplied.—p. 24.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In that case the vendor, who got up the company with the view of selling his adventure to it, attracted shareholders by a prospectus which was essentially false. The directors, who were virtually his nominees, purchased from him without being aware of the real facts; and, on their assurance that, in so far as they knew, all was right, the shareholders sanctioned the transaction. The fraud by which the company and its shareholders had been misled was directly traceable to the vendor; and it was set aside at the instance of the liquidator, the L.C. (Earl Cairns) expressing a doubt whether, even in those circumstances, the remedy was not too late, after a liquidation order. But in this case, the agreement of July 20th was, in the full knowledge of the facts, approved and adopted by the company itself, if there was a company, and by all the shareholders who ever were or were likely to be members of the company. In my opinion, therefore, Erlanger v. New Sombbrero Co. has no application.—p. 43.

LORD DAVEY.—Counsel relied on some dicta in Erlanger v. New Sombbrero Co., a case which is often quoted and not infrequently misunderstood. Of course Lord Cairns' observations were directed only to a case such as he had before him, where it was attempted to bind a large body of shareholders by a contract which purported to have been made between the vendor and directors before the shares were offered for subscription, whereas it appeared that the directors were only the nominees of the vendor, who had accepted his bidding and exercised no judgment of their own. It has nothing to do with the present case.—p. 53.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Upon principle it appears to me clear that there is nothing to prevent the company from claiming the profit secretly got from it by those whose duty it was not to make such profit without informing the company of what they were doing. A few words must be said respecting the authorities relied on by the defendant. Salomon v. Salomon & Co. is in no way opposed to this conclusion. That case turned on the fact that every member of the company knew everything of the circumstances upon which the liquidator afterwards relied in order to support the claim he made in the name of the company, but really on behalf of the creditors who, in the view taken by the House of Lords, had not been defrauded. Neither is this case covered by British Seamless Paper Box Co., In re (post, col. 425), for nothing was concealed from any one in that case. But what Sir G. Jessel there said is very pertinent in the present case. . . . The syndicate agreement and the two other agreements of even date remove all difficulty which in their absence might have been created by Gover's Case (post, col. 402), and by Ladywell Mining Co. v. Brookes (col. 395), so far as relates to the commencement of the character of promoter. The right to recover the profit without rescinding the contract of purchase is said to be inconsistent with, and indeed directly opposed to, the decision of this Court in Cape Breton Co., In re, which was affirmed by the H. L., but on different grounds. Cape Breton Co., In re, was followed by this Court in Ladywell Mining Co. v. Brookes, but in Lydney, &c. Co. v. Bird (supra, col. 394) it was pointed out that the decision in Cape Breton Co., In re, turned on the special combination of facts which had there to be considered. The report of Cape Breton Co., In re, shows that the great difficulty presented by it arose from the fact that the promoters had bought and paid for the property which they afterwards sold to a company. They did not, as here, pay for what they bought out of money got from the company to whom they re-sold it. Pearson, J. and the C. A. treated the vendors simply as persons who had sold their own property to a company afterwards promoted by them without disclosing the fact that the property was theirs. This is the true explanation of the principal difficulty felt by Pearson, J. and Cotton and Fry, L.J.J. in Cape Breton Co., In re, whose judgments, however, were dissented from by Bowen, L.J. No one decided in that case that, as a general proposition, the mere fact that a contract for purchase by a company cannot be rescinded precludes the company from obtaining from the vendor, if he is a promoter, and still less if he is also a director, a secret profit made by him at its expense. So to hold would be contrary to well settled law and to many decisions, some of which were referred to in Lydney, &c. Co. v. Bird.—p. 442.

WRIGHT, J.—There were two matters which lay at the root of the judgments in the C. A. and the H. L. in Olympia, Ltd., In re. One was the conclusion at which the L.J.J. and the law lords arrived—that is, that from the beginning, from the date of the earliest agreement for acquisition on the part of the vendors, there was also a commencement of the promotion of the company which was ultimately promoted. . . . The second ground upon which the C. A. proceeded was an express and fraudulent representation made by the vendors to the vendee company. Now, neither of these circumstances is present here.—p. 277.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—Bedford v. Bagshaw is a case where the defendant and others forming the board of management of a joint-stock company for the purpose of getting the shares of the company inserted in the official list of the stock exchange, untruthfully represented that two-thirds of the scrip had been paid upon. The shares being in consequence of that representation inserted in the official list, the plaintiff knowing the requirements of the stock exchange, on the faith that two-thirds of the scrip had been paid upon, purchased shares in the company. The jury found that the representation was made fraudulently. The Court of Ex. held that the defendant was liable for the damages sustained by the plaintiff, although the representation was not made to him directly. Two of the learned judges, Martin and Bramwell, BB., considered the case to be concluded by a former decision, in a case of Seymour v. Bagshaw, against the same defendant. The proceedings in that case, however, hardly appear to recommend it as an authority. The action was tried by Jervis, C.J., who told the jury that if the plaintiff was induced, by seeing the shares quoted in the official list of the stock exchange, to purchase them, and if they believed that the insertion of the shares in the list was procured by the false and fraudulent representation of the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. A bill of exceptions was tendered to the C.J.'s ruling. In the Ex. Ch. judgment was pronounced by consent, without argument, for the purpose of going at once to the H. L. This is stated in the C. B. Reports (18 C. B. 908), but Bramwell, B. says (4 H. & N. 547—548), that the judgment in the Ex. Ch. did not pass sub silentio. [Note.—But see the fuller report in 29 L. J. Ex. 64, where the words of the learned Baron are: "I have got a very strong impression on my mind that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer did not pass sub silentio" Martin, B. had previously said that the parties did not think fit to argue it, and therefore the judgment was affirmed." The apparent difference probably arose thus, the counsel did not argue the question, but the judges among themselves might have discussed it.] No other trace, however, of the manner in which the case was disposed of is to be found, except in the short notice of it in the C. B. Reports. On the case being called on in the H. L., the counsel for Bagshaw, the plaintiff in error, said he did not think he could usefully occupy the time of the House by arguing it, and he at once submitted to a judgment for the defendant in error. How, under these circumstances, this case could be considered as a conclusive authority by the judges who decided Bedford v. Bagshaw, it is hard to understand. But the cases themselves cannot, in my opinion, be supported. The actions were brought upon the allegations of a false representation made to the plaintiff. But no representation at all was made which reached either his eyes or his ears. From his knowing the rules of the stock exchange he assumed that a certain representation had been made, and acted upon it. According to the judgment, it was his knowledge of the rules which led him to appropriate the representation to himself, and therefore it could not be taken to be made to any one who was ignorant of these rules. The decisions, and the grounds upon which they proceeded, appear to me to be extraordinary, and I cannot bring my mind to agree with them. In Scott v. Dixon, which is to be found in the note to Bedford v. Bagshaw in the Law Journal, an action was brought against a director of a banking company for falsely, fraudulently, and deceitfully publishing and representing to the plaintiffs that a dividend was about to be paid out of the profits which were sufficient for payment of the dividend, and that the shares were a safe investment for the money. The plaintiffs bought their shares upon the faith of a report made by the directors to the shareholders which contained the false representations. Copies of this report were left at the bank, and were to be had by sharebrokers or any persons applying for it who were desirous of information with regard to the affairs of the bank, with a view to the purchase of shares. The plaintiffs purchased at the bank, through their broker, a copy of the report. The Court of Queen's Bench held that there being positive evidence that the report was to be bought by any person who thought of becoming a purchaser of shares, and that it came into the hands of the plaintiffs in this manner, and by the perusal of it they were induced to buy shares in the bank, there was a publication to the plaintiffs in the sense of the declaration; I do not doubt the propriety of this decision. The report, though originally made to the shareholders, was intended for the information of all persons who were disposed to deal in shares, and the representation must be regarded as having been made, not indirectly, but directly, to each person who obtained the report from the bank, where it was publicly announced it was to be bought, in the same manner as if it had been personally delivered to him by the director. Gerhard v. Bates is supposed to be an authority in support of the argument that a prospectus, containing untrue representations, may be made the ground of an action by a purchaser of shares, who has been deceived and induced by the representations to become a shareholder. That case, however, establishes no such proposition, but rather, as I read it, the contrary. . . . Lord Campbell, in giving judgment for the plaintiff, said "Had it been alleged that the defendant, meaning to deceive and injure the plaintiff, and to induce him to purchase shares in the company under the belief that it was a safe and profitable undertaking, fraudulently delivered to the plaintiff the prospectus containing the false representation, whereby the plaintiff was induced to purchase the shares, there can be no doubt that the count would have been sufficient. The allegations which it does contain appear to us to be equivalent." And he afterwards adds, "if the plaintiff had only averred that having seen the prospectus he was induced to purchase the shares, objection might have been made that a connection did not sufficiently appear between the act of the defendant and the act of the plaintiff from which the loss arose;" a remark which has a direct application to the present case. Gerhard v. Bates, therefore, is no authority for holding that upon a prospectus addressed to the public by the directors of a company, any one of the public who has been led to take shares upon the faith of the representations thus published, can maintain an action against them. The observations of Lord Campbell rather indicate a contrary opinion—pp. 36–38.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion, without discussing the effects of these cases [Barry v. Croskey and Peek v. Croskey, and approved by Lord Cairns in Peek v. Gurney, in my judgment covers the case.—p. 306.

RIGBY, L.J.—I think there is nothing in Peek v. Gurney, or in any other case, which meets the present one. . . . De Berenger's Case [Ree v. De Berenger (1814) 3 M. & S. 67; 15 R. R. 415.—K.B.] has nothing to do with this case. It was said that Lord Russell had differed from the decision in that case; but I see no ground for that suggestion, for he merely said that nothing that had been stated by Wood, V.-C. in Barry v. Croskey about De Berenger's Case could in his opinion alter the liability of persons who, being owners of property, procure false statements to be made about that particular property in order to induce members of the public to purchase that property from them.—p. 307.

LOPES, L.J.—It is unnecessary to express any opinions as to whether the decisions of Kekewich, J. would have been right if the decision of the C. A. in Peek v. Derry had not been reversed in the H. L. The H. L. have held that if a statement is untrue in fact, but believed to be true, though without any reasonable grounds for such belief, no action for deceit will lie. There must be moral delinquency, actual dishonesty. Lord Herschell and the other lords adopt the first three definitions of fraud necessary to support an action of deceit which I gave in Peek v. Derry; the fourth, he and the other learned lords reject. The fourth definition was, if the statement is untrue in fact, but believed to be true, without any reasonable grounds for such belief. It is on this definition of fraud that the learned judge in the Court below acted. The H. L., as I read the opinions of the learned lords, have held that the inaccuracy of a statement, however unreasonable, if honest and bona fide, will not support an action for deceit—I presume because it does not contain the necessary element of dishonesty.—p. 823. LINDLEY, L.J.—Speaking of Derry v. Peek broadly, I take it that it has settled once for all the controversy which was well known to have given rise to very considerable differences of opinion as to whether an action for negligent misrepresentation, as distinguished from fraudulent misrepresentation, could be maintained. There was considerable authority to the effect that it could, and there was considerable authority to the effect that it could not; and, as I understand Derry v. Peek, it settles that question in this way, that an action for a negligent, as distinguished from a fraudulent, misrepresentation [in a company's prospectus] cannot be supported. I think it is perfectly impossible to read the judgments which were delivered in that case, especially Lord Herschell's, to which I will allude presently, without seeing that that is the broad proposition of the law which Derry v. Peek has settled, and settled for good.—p. 451. See judgment at length, and also judgments of Bowen and Kay, L.J.J.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self. BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.J.J.).—No doubt a surrender of shares in consideration of a payment in money or money's worth by the company is a purchase by it of its own shares, and is ultra vires, as pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in Trevor v. Whitworth. But, as we understand this transaction, the company is giving nothing in the shape of money or other available assets for the shares which it acquires. . . . The capital might be in excess of the wants of the company within the words of sect. 3 of the Companies Act, 1867. But these words cannot, in our opinion, be construed so as to enable a company to prefer one shareholder to another of the same class as himself by buying up his shares, and we cannot regard Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Trevor v. Whitworth as intimating that any such transaction is within the statute. His remarks were made to enforce his view that, apart from the Companies Acts, 1861 and 1877, it is ultra vires of a limited company to buy its own shares, even if its memorandum and articles expressly authorise it to do so. But he was not contemplating preferring one shareholder to another of the same class as himself.—p. 455.

KEKEWICH, J.—There is a strong current of opinion in favour of upholding surrenders in connection with forfeiture for due cause, even though the forms of forfeiture have not been complied with; and more than one judge has inclined to, if he has not expressed, the opinion that, to use the language of Fitzgibbon, L.J. in Balquhoy Distillery Co., In re (supra, col. 406), "Shares might be given by a shareholder gratuitously for the advantage of the company." In a concise summary, which indicates the absence of finality, Mr. Palmer in his work on Company Law (3rd ed.), p. 67, says: "Possibly a surrender to the company by way of donation may be free from objection." But it must be taken to have been conclusively settled by the H. L. in Trevor v. Whitworth, that a company under the Act of 1862, has no power to purchase its own shares, and that such a transaction cannot be sanctioned even by the memorandum of association. . . . In Snell's Case (supra, col. 405), Giffard, L.J., upheld a surrender of shares on which there was a liability for calls; and if that decision can properly be treated as unimpeached, it is undoubtedly in conflict with my opinions, which I should therefore be bound to abandon. Snell's Case was cited in Trevor v. Whitworth, and according to the reporter, commented on at length, but it is not noticed by either of the learned lords who took part in the judgment of the House. It seems to me, however, that the L.J.'s decision is not only inconsistent with much that was said, but is directly in conflict with the actual result. In saying this I am of course assuming the soundness of my view that the surrender of shares not fully paid up is really a transaction of sale and purchase; and Snell's Case does not say that it is not. . . . That case [Dronfield Silkestone Coal Co.'s Case] was necessarily discussed at length in Trevor v. Whitworth, and the grounds of the decision of the C. A. were not regarded with favour. But Lord Macnaghten took occasion to point out that, while disapproving of the grounds, he thought the decision itself was sound. In short, he held that the liquidator had no equity to place Mr. Ward's name on the register when it had been off for seven years, during which the company had been prosperous and the shareholders who remained had received dividends largely increased by Ward's retirement. Lord Macnaghten cites Lord Cairns's decision in Snell's Case (supra, col. 485), and fully approves it.—p. 619.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—In Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague the directors never had been lawfully appointed, and there was no proper quorum: the minority of the subscribers to the memorandum of association could not bind the shareholders: the body making the call was incompetent. In the case before us, for the reasons which I have given, it seems to me that a number of directors competent to make a call existed. In Bottomley's Case, a proper number of directors had been appointed; but this number had been reduced by death and insolvency, and the vacancies had not been filled up; and Jessel, M.R., as it seems to me, properly held that the number of directors having been reduced below the lawful number, they could not bind the shareholders by their acts. I am unable to agree with the view taken by Jessel, M.R., of Kirk v. Bell: the judges of the Court of Q. B. there proceeded upon a different ground, and they decided that there was not a quorum competent to transact the extraordinary business of the company. In my view Kirk v. Bell and Bottomley's Case are not in point for our decision. . . . That case [Thames-Haven Dock and Ry. v. Rose] shows that the business of the company does not come to a standstill because the proper number of directors does not exist. I am aware that that case is different from the case before us in its facts, but the judges of the Court of C. P. overruled the cogent argument addressed to them, and some of them at least were of opinion that the enactment as to the number of directors was directory only.—p. 697.

BRETT, L.J.—If the facts had been the same as in Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague, it would have been necessary for us to consider whether that case could be supported; but in that case only three of the subscribers to the memorandum of association appointed the directors, whereas in the case before us four of the subscribers elected three directors, and the others were elected by these three: the directors, therefore, were elected by a majority of the subscribers: and I know of no rule of law preventing the majority of a body from binding the minority. . . . I think that the reasoning of Lord Cairns in Murray v. Bush applies. I prefer to follow the doctrine laid down by him rather than that laid down by Lord Chelmsford in the same case. I think that the defendant was bound by his acting as director: in this point of view also it must be taken that he joined in the allotment to himself, and I think that he is estopped from denying his liability. I feel more strongly upon this point than the L.C.J. appears to do. As to this question, and with regard to the cases cited before us, I wish to say that I am unable to agree with Houbesch Coal Co. v. Teague, but I agree with Harvard's Case (post, col. 414) and Fowler's Case (post, col. 415). These cases show that the defendant must be taken to have allotted to himself and to have accepted the shares.—p. 699. HOLKER, L.J. concurred.

Houbesch Coal Co. v. Teague, discussed.
Dawson v. African Consolidated Land and Trading Co. (1897) 67 L. J. Ch. 47; [1898] 1 Ch. 6; 77 L. T. 392; 46 W. R. 132.—C.A.

LINDEY, M.R.—I do not understand how Houbesch Coal Co. v. Teague can be cited as an authority to the effect that such an article as art. 114 only applies to outsiders dealing bona fide with the company without notice. It applies to and covers all such transactions, and there is nothing that I can discover in the judgments in Houbesch Coal Co. v. Teague which warrants the contention that this clause does not apply to calls and things of that kind as between the company on the one side and the shareholders on the other side. Houbesch Coal Co. v. Teague is intelligible up to a certain point; and as to the rest of it, it is so reported that I confess I do not thoroughly understand it. But the defect which the Court put their finger down upon in Houbesch Coal Co. v. Teague was, that the persons there who made the call had been improperly appointed by three out of seven of the subscribers to the memorandum of association. That was wrong, and the validating clause there—art. 60, which was similar in its terms to art. 114 here—did not cure that radical defect in their appointment. The Court having held that, upset the call, and declared the call was invalid. So far it is plain enough—that was the ratio decidendi, and that I follow perfectly well. Then comes a part of the case I do not follow with equal ease. Granting that the appointment of these gentlemen was altogether wrong, as it obviously was, and granting that the validating clause there did not apply, I do not see myself that it necessarily follows that what they did, although they had been improperly appointed, would not be validated; and I do not say that any of the judges, in giving judgment in that case, addressed himself to that point.—p. 51. CHITTY and V. WILLIAMS, L.J.J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—What is required of them [the subscribers to the memorandum of association] is, that they shall determine the number of directors and the names of the first directors; and it seems to me that if all of them do in any way show their determination on the subject, that ought to be treated as valid. This appears to have been the opinion of Lord Hatherley, when V.-C., who says in Hallows v. Fernie: "I very much doubt whether it is necessary that these persons should meet together. If any one of the subscribers to the contract"—that is, the memorandum of association—"raises a question, he may be entitled to say, 'I will not have this decided without a meeting of us all'; but if they all concur (as in this case), it seems to me hypercritical to say the appointment was irregular." That seems to me, if I may say so, excellent sense; and in the absence of any authority which compels me to another conclusion, I shall act on it. Now the authority which was relied on on the other side is the well-known case of D'Arcy v. Tamar, &c. Ry. That was a case in which, there being more than three directors, three constituted a quorum, and the secretary, in order to affix the seal of the company to a document which was to bind the company, got three of the directors to attest the affixing of the seal, they not having met together, but being casually picked up, one after the other. It was held that that would not do. But, to my mind, that case is clearly distinguishable on two grounds. First of all, in that case only a quorum acted—and that is open to very serious objection. It is pointed out by Lord Bramwell, who took part in the decision, that if a quorum of three, not meeting together and not being regularly summoned, were to act, another quorum of three might meet in a different place and come to exactly an opposite conclusion, and therefore the government of the company by means of quorums so picked up would be impossible. It is also open to this serious observation, that the minority have no means of stating whether they assent to or dissent from the act proposed, and have no means of bringing their views before their colleagues if they do dissent. These are very serious objections to the validity of the procedure where only a quorum assent to the act; but where the whole body of directors act, or assent to the act, even though they do not meet, the validity of the act is not open to the same objections. Besides that, the reasoning of the various members of the Court was based upon this, that they found from the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, an obligation upon the directors, acting as directors, to meet and act jointly and as a board. I find here in Table A. no such obligation as regards the subscribers to the memorandum of association when they act simply for the purpose of nominating the first directors. I think, therefore, the case cited does not govern the present.—pp. 480—482.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—It was laid down by the Court of Ex. in D'Arcy v. Tamar, &c. Ry. that directors must act together as a board, and that it is not sufficient to procure the separate authority of the number of directors sufficient to form a quorum. That case turned upon the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but it seems to me to be equally applicable to a limited company under the Act of 1862. In Collie's Claim, Bacon, V.-C. seems to have treated the decision of the Court of Ex. as turning upon the common law rule of pleading, and although it was not perhaps necessary to the decision of the case before him, he certainly regarded an agreement which on the face of it was signed by four directors at different dates and not as a board as a contract binding the company. I cannot follow the criticisms of the V.-C., and I prefer the view of the law taken by the Court of Ex. My attention was, however, drawn to Southern Counties Bank v. Rider (post, col. 437), decided by the C.A. I do not think the decision in that case can be taken as laying down any general principle which I am bound to follow—neither the case in the Court of Ex. nor the case before Bacon, V.-C. was cited. It does not touch the question whether a notice given without any kind of board meeting having been held is valid.—p. 500.

ALVERSTONE, C.J.—That the debenture, if valid, creates a charge on the assets of the company has been well established ever since the decisions in Standard Manufacturing Co., In re (post, col. 448), and Opera, Ltd., In re (post, col. 448), in 1891. It was there decided that all such charges prevail as against an execution creditor if the debenture is valid. . . . I asked counsel for the execution creditor whether he knew of any decided case in which it had been held that informality did or would alter the privilege of a debenture-holder who was holder of a debenture that was valid to all appearance. He has fairly and freely stated that he could find no such case except D'Arcy v. Tamar, &c. Ry. On the other hand, from the decision in Royal British Bank v. Turgand (post, col. 437), to that in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (post, col. 437), it has been held that it is not incumbent upon the bona fide holder of a document purporting to be issued by a company to inquire whether the persons purporting to sign as directors have been duly appointed.

There is therefore ample authority to show that no informality will alter the privilege possessed by a bona fide holder for value upon a document that purports to be in order.—p. 628. LAW-RANCE, J. concurred.

SELBORNE, L.J.—In that case (Abercorn's Case) the naked question was raised, whether, from the acceptance of the office of director, and the consequently authorised representation to the world that the person so accepting was a director, such representation being continued over a certain period of time, a contract with the company to take shares would be inferred. In that particular case the option was either to have shares or insure in the company. But the shares might be acquired in various ways, and the L.J. held that from the mere acceptance of the office of director without more, they could not infer a contract to become a shareholder.—p. 155.

JAMES, L.J.—In the case of Leeke it certainly was not my intention nor the intention of the L.J. to overrule the decision in Lord Abercorn's Case. We never even referred to it. There may be an expression, taken by itself, separate from the context, which may appear to give colour to the proposition that I intended to say that becoming a director involved an agreement to take the qualifying shares. If so, it is only another instance of the inaccuracy of language to which we are all liable.—p. 156.

It is distinguishable from the present case, but I must say it seems to me to be opposed to the true sense of the Act of Parliament. . . . It might have been held that he ought to have taken five more shares, but, as it seems to me, there was nothing to justify the Court in fixing him with twenty-five additional shares, and I should have thought that both good law and good sense would have been satisfied by adopting Mr. Fowler's view of the transaction.—p. 622.

V. There was a statement of the terms upon which persons could become directors, and the persons with those terms before them afterwards chose to become directors; and the decision only was that by becoming directors they accepted those terms, and therefore contracted to take the shares in accordance with those terms. There is nothing of the sort here, because there is no offer of any sort or kind by the company which could be said to be accepted by the directors by their becoming directors, because they were already directors at the moment when this prospectus was issued.—p. 306.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The first question is, what is the meaning in art. 67 of the expression "in his own right"? The meaning of a similar article was considered by the late M.R. in Fulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co. . . . His lordship held the words were not introduced to show that the director must be beneficial owner, but to negative his holding the shares in a representative character. This decision, which was in 1878, remained undisputed till 1889, when it was discussed in Bainbridge v. Smith. Cotton, L.J. expressed dissent from the construction adopted by the M.R. Lindley, L.J., said that though he should have hesitated to accept that construction if the matter had been res integra, he considered that as the words were in common use, and had acquired in consequence of that decision a conventional meaning, which had been accepted and acted upon, it would not be safe now to put a construction on them de novo. So stands the case upon the authorities. I do not intend to express any opinion whether, treating the matter as res integra, the view of the M.R. was right; but I agree with Lindley, L.J., that, having regard to the constant transactions both as to framing articles of association and as to dealings under them, it would be very inconvenient to interfere with a decision which has remained unquestioned for so many years. To do so would be an injustice to persons who have acted on the faith of the decision.—p. 567. And see post.

COTTON, L.J.—Cases were referred to in which the late M. R. and Wood, V.-C. had determined that matters which were not under the powers expressly given to the directors or the general meeting were within the powers of the directors of a going concern. One was Taunton v. Royal Insurance Co., where it was held that an insurance company might pay losses arising from lightning, which were not within the loss which they professed to insure against; and the other case, Hampson v. Price's Patent Candle Co., where the M.R. held that the directors of Price's Patent Candle Co. were at liberty to make, and could not be restrained from making, a gratuity to their servants when there had been a very good year, by giving each of them who was in their service and was of good character a gratuity equal to a week's wages. In my opinion those cases went on a principle which is not applicable to the existing state of this company, from the time when it handed over its railway to another company, and existed only for the purpose of winding up the concern. The principle of those cases, as I understand, is this, that where there are directors of a trading company, those directors necessarily have incidentally the power of doing that which is ordinarily and reasonably done in every such business, with a view to getting either better work from their servants, or with a view to attract customers to them, as in the case of an insurance company. In the last-mentioned case the M.R. refers to this—that although it is said that nothing of this kind is to be expected again, yet when such a gratuity is given to servants in a good year, the servants then in the company's service, whom the directors may reasonably expect to stay, naturally look forward, not as a matter of right but as a matter of liberality, to this, that they will probably be dealt with in a similar way by their exertions they get a good profit, and that, therefore, that was a reasonable mode of carrying on the business of the company for the purpose of making it most profitable. But that assumes that it is a going concern, that it is a continuing business, and it is with reference to the effect upon the continuing business that the directors are said to have that power incidentally. And so in the case before Wood, V.-C. There it was shown that what the insurance company did was a reasonable way of conducting the business of an insurance office, in order to attract customers, by paying losses which were not strictly within the terms of the policy, and therefore could not be said to be legally enforceable against the company. But here the company was gone as a company carrying on business for the purpose of making profit.—p. 664.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case there is a provision in the articles of association fixing definitely the amount of the remuneration of the directors, which did not exist in Cannon, Ex parte. . . In that case Pearson, J. clearly proceeded on the ground that the directors had no contractual rights at all as against the company, and that entirely distinguishes that case from the present. A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The particular article which we have to construe in the present case differs from that which was before the Court in Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co., as well from the version as it was assumed by the Court there to be, as from what it now turns out was the actual version. In the report of that case it is assumed that by the articles there in question the remuneration to be paid to the directors was to be "at the rate of" 200*l.* a year. It now appears that the true version of the article was that the directors should "each receive by way of remuneration out of the funds of the company in each year the sum of 200*l.* per annum." The article with which we have to deal here provides that "the directors"—that is, the whole body of the directors—"shall be paid out of the funds of the company, by way of remuneration for their services . . . the sum of 125*l.* per annum per director . . . and the same shall be divided amongst them in such proportion as the directors by agreement may determine, and in default of any such determination, equally."—p. 451.

COLLINS, L.J.—Whatever be the hypothesis on which Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co. was decided—whether it was upon the article as in the report of that case it is stated to have been, or upon the article, as it actually was—that decision does not touch the present case. For according to the terms of the article in the present case there is no fixed sum to be paid to any director. It in fact negatives the right of any director to say before the end of the year what remuneration is to be paid to him—p. 452. ROMER, L.J. concurred.

WRIGHT, J.—Certainly it [Lambert v. Northern Ry. of Buenos Ayres] is not a direct authority, for there the relator applied to restrain the company from paying the remuneration which they wanted to pay; and the ground of the decision was, that no such bill ought to be entertained. No doubt Malins, V.-C. uses in that case some observations which are capable of meaning that, in a case like this, an agreement to waive remuneration comes to nothing; but I think that those observations were directed only to the case in which the remuneration had been already earned. In any case I do not feel clear that the decision is one which ought to be regarded as having the effect which it is now sought to attach to it.—p. 254.

GIFFARD, J.J.—Suffice it to say that as regards that case the transaction was a totally different one. It was not a purchase of shares by the bank for the purposes of the bank—it was not a speculation in shares at all; but it was the case of a certain sum of money being advanced by the bank to assist in the purchase of shares, which were to be taken by Mr. Fletcher, he, if he got those shares at par, agreeing to become a director; and even in the judgment in that case the utmost that is said is that it is difficult to say that the articles of association do not, in terms at least, include the power to enter into a transaction of that description, which transaction was wholly different from this.—p. 599.

JAMES, L.J.—It is, in my judgment, very much to be regretted that that case (Orgill's Case) was not allowed resquecere in pace, and to moulder in the obscure corner of the Law Times to which it was consigned, and that its frailties should have been dragged from that dread abode. I cannot understand that case. There is evidently some mistake in what is said there, because the principle upon which it was said that the company had lost their right to recover money which was then paid by the vendors to the directors.
 was that they did not repudiate the contract.
 Now, in every one of the cases it is where a contract is not repudiated that the money is recovered from the agent, because if the principal who has been defrauded is relieved from everything and is restored to his original position, of course he has nothing whatever to then say with regard to the moneys which have passed, or have been agreed to be passed, between the confederates. That case stands alone, it has been left undisturbed until now, it is entirely inconsistent with the whole current of authority

 JAMES, L.J.—The M.R. was of opinion, and I agree with him, that the directors were, and intended to be, thoroughly honest, and that they were, and intended to remain, the sole proprietors of the property of the company, and the sole members of the company, and that whatever agreements they chose to make among themselves as to the division of the property, concerned themselves alone. That being so, it distinguishes this case from Society of Practical Knowledge v.

Abbott, because in all these cases, when anything like a bonus has been given to directors, and it is called in question by allottees of shares, the burden of proof is thrown on those who have received it, to satisfy the Court that it was intended to be, and was in fact, honestly received. If they were intending, although then constituting the whole company, that other people should come in afterwards to whom what had been done would be injurious, the Court would feel no difficulty in saying, as Lord Langdale did in Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, that they intended to commit a fraud. Here there was nothing of that kind.—p. 476.

REBUTT, L.J., to the same effect.

COTTON, L.J.—The circumstances of this case entirely distinguish it from Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, for there it was intended from the beginning to offer the shares to the public, and the directors had no right to deceive those whom they intended to bring into the company. I also think that the observations of James, L.J., in Andrews, Laka Tin and Copper Mining Co., In re (supra, col. 394), are not at all inconsistent with our decision.—p. 480.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, LORD HALSBURY, and A. L. SMITH, L.J.).—The question is whether these presents can be treated as valid against the liquidator on the winding up of the company, which is hopelessly insolvent, and which was largely in debt when these presents were made. Williams, J. has held that they are unimpeachable, and he referred to British Seamless Paper Box Co., In re, as supporting his view. But that case is very unlike this. The directors there had allotted shares to some of themselves as fully paid up. The shares were, in fact, allotted in consideration of some patents taken over by the company; and an agreement to issue the shares as paid up was registered. The transaction, therefore, was intra vires, and it was taken to be so both by counsel and by the Court. Further, the transaction was perfectly honest throughout, and it was sanctioned by a general meeting of the company, which then consisted of only the directors and one other person, who assented to what was done. More than a year afterwards shares were issued to other people, and the company being ultimately wound up, the liquidators sought to recover the nominal value of the shares, treating them, in fact, as not paid up. The Court held that this could not be done, because the transaction (being intra vires) was honest, and was sanctioned by all the members of the company at the time. But in this case the presents made by the directors to Mr. Newman, their chairman, were made out of money borrowed by the company for the purposes of its business; and this money the directors had no right to apply in making presents to one of themselves.—p. 412.

EARL OF SELBORNE (for self, LORDS WATSON, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS and SHAND, and SIR R. COUCH).—As to the measure of damage, their lordships do not think that the authorities cited by the respondents, of which Morrah Consols Tin Mining Co., In re [M'Kay's Case] and West Jendell Tin Mining Co., In re [Weston's Case], are typical examples, are applicable to this case, when related to one of an agreement made bona fide, but partially ultra vires. These were cases in which directors or fiduciary agents of companies had appropriated to themselves and for their own benefit, by means of secret bargains with promoters or vendors, shares represented as paid up, for which no consideration had been given, or other property of which they were trustees for their companies. In all of them the actual or presumable value was treated as a proper subject for evidence; and the principle applicable was, in Morrah Consols Tin Mining Co., In re, thus explained by Mellish, L.J.: "I think he is only liable for what was the fair value of the shares when the allotment was made or at any subsequent time. But M'Kay is a wrong-doer; and, therefore, in estimating the damages, a presumption may be made against him which could not be made against a person who was not a wrong-doer."—p. 8.

SELWYN, L.J.—Under these circumstances it appears to me that we should be doing something which is entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of Parliament [Companies Act, 1862], so general as they are, if we were to introduce any such qualification as that said to have been laid down by the M.R. in the case of the Royal Hotel Company of Great Yarmouth.

His lordship is there reported to have said, "Where there is really a question to be tried, then I do not think this sect. 165 enables you to dispose of it in this way": and again, he says, the Court "can only do so in plain and straightforward cases where there is no point of law to be determined." Considering the great accuracy of the present Law Reports, one is very much disinclined to doubt that those are the words of the M.R.; otherwise, having regard to what I have always understood to be his own opinion upon the subject, and to his own decision in Cardiff Preserved Coal Co. v. Norton, I could not help thinking that there must be some error in that report. However that may be, I feel bound to say that I do not think there is to be found either in the words of the present Act of Parliament or in the conclusion which is justly to be drawn from the decisions upon this subject, any such qualification or limitation as that which is there expressed by his lordship; and if we were so to hold in all these cases we should be inducing the person against whom the charge is made to endeavour to make out that there was some question to be tried, or that the matter was not so plain or straightforward as it was represented to be; and there are very few cases indeed in which some such attempt as that might not be made with some reasonable hope of success. The result would be to occasion the necessity for a double mode of proceeding and unnecessary expense and delay.—p. 485.

British Guardian Life Assurance Company, in re (1880) 14 Ch. D. 335; 49 L. J. Ch. 446; 28 W. R. 945. HALL, V.-C.—First, as to the objection taken that sect. 165 (Companies Act, 1862) is incapable of being put in operation against the executors of a deceased director. It has been contended that the question was expressly decided by Kindersley, V.-C. in Felton's Executors' Case, and that the decision was recognised by Selwyn, L.J. in Hawkins, Ex parte, and I think that the express point was decided, and upon the literal words of sect. 165. Looking at the language of the section in reference to making an offender who is criminally responsible liable, it appears to me that there is a total absence of power to investigate the conduct of a dead man under it; therefore I am of opinion that the words are in favour of the construction put upon them by Kindersley, V.-C. It has been contended that having regard to the later decision in Stringer's Case, upon sect. 165, the decision in Felton's Executors' Case is no longer binding, and that the Court can now take a more enlarged view, and apply the section to the case of a dead director. A good deal could perhaps be said in favour of the view, that notwithstanding the particular words of sect. 165, upon the whole of the statute a larger construction might be adopted in reference to the point which has been discussed, but no case has been referred to in which the question has been considered and adjudicated upon, for I cannot say that the case before the M.R. in 1877 (Stringer's Case) is sufficiently in point for me to follow, looking at the form of the order made. I cannot hold that the executors of a deceased director are persons who can be made liable under sect. 165. . . .

Carpenter's Executors' Case arose under a different statute differently framed, and when examined it will be found to be inapplicable to the present case. An observation was made in reference to Stringer's Case that all objections are open to the parties as in a suit. That, however, means as to defence upon the merits, and not in regard to parties. The point in that case was that the persons sought to be charged could have been brought before the Court by bill filed against them, and that was true—pp. 340, 341.

PRY, J.—One matter remains for consideration, with respect to which, I confess, I have felt very considerable doubt, and that is the question of delay. [His lordship stated the material dates, and continued:—] These dates do not differ materially from the dates in Mammoth Copperopolis of Utah, in re, in which Hall, V.-C. considered that the staleness of the demand was a sufficient answer to the application of the official liquidator. If the two cases had been precisely parallel I should have felt myself bound to follow that decision, but it appears to me that they are not. In that case the directors had declared a dividend upon the footing of a balance-sheet which had been made up, and which I think, according to the view of the V.-C., was made up in a bona fide manner, although there might be grave questions as to the propriety of it. He considered that the liquidator's application was in fact an attempt to unravel the balance-sheets which had been passed and acted upon, and I observe that, in stating the considerations which led him to the conclusion that the demand was stale, he dwells in the first place upon the nature of the demand. Similar observations apply to Stringer's Case. There an attempt was made to compel a director to repay a dividend said to have been paid out of capital, by means of attacking three items in a balance-sheet which had been passed and acted upon. There also, the Court thought the delay was a sufficient answer. In the present case there is nothing of that sort. The transaction stands disclosed in the simplest way. There is no balance-sheet which it can be for a moment suggested induced the directors to come to the conclusion that there were divisible profits. It is a simple case in which the capital of the company or the moneys borrowed by the company were applied in the payment of that which, according to the plain terms of the articles of association, could be paid only out of profits.—p. 162.

BRETT, L.J.—I confess that I am extremely sorry that the restrictive interpretation which Coventry and Dixon's Case has put upon sect. 165 has been put upon it; because I have always thought that that section was the most salutary section in the whole of the Act, and one intended to meet, as I should have thought, in the very widest terms, transactions which have become a perfect scandal in the getting up of companies in this country. However, we are bound by the interpretation which has been put upon that section by the decision in Coventry and Dixon's Case.—p. 505.

COTTON, L.J.—It [Coventry and Dixon's Case] is, of course, binding on the Court, but I must consider it, not only as a binding decision, but as one the principle of which I approve.—p. 508. JESSEL, M.R. concurred.

Even if he had himself entertained a different view, he was not likely to refuse to follow that case; and the object of the present appeal is, in fact, to have that case overruled. It is said that it is not consistent with Coventry and Dixon's Case. This latter case decides that under sect. 165 directors cannot be made liable for anything (except perhaps for interest) for which they could not be made liable independently, not of the Act, but of that particular section. If, then, the decision of National Funds Assurance Co., In re, had been founded on some new equity arising under s. 165, it could not be relied upon. It is not, however, founded on any such equity, but on the law, independently of that section, and I entirely adhere to the judgment given in it.—p. 532.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—I should like to say one word as regards Turgand v. Marshall. I certainly never intended to lay down the strong proposition that a person acting for another as his agent is not bound to use all the ordinary prudence that can be properly and legitimately expected from any person in the conduct of the affairs of the world, namely, the same amount of prudence which, in the same circumstances, he would exercise on his own behalf. What I did intend to state in that case was, that I could not measure—and I think it would be a very fatal error in the verdict of any Court of justice to attempt to measure—the amount of prudence that ought to be exercised by the amount of prudence which the judge himself might think, under similar circumstances, he should have exercised. I think it extremely likely that many a judge, or many a person versed by long experience in the affairs of mankind, as conducted in the mercantile world, will know that there is a great deal more trust, a great deal more speculation, and a great deal more readiness to confide in the probabilities of things, with regard to success in mercantile transactions, than there is on the part of those whose habits of life are entirely of a different character. It would be extremely wrong to import into the consideration of the case of a person acting as a mercantile agent in the purchase of a business concern those principles of extreme caution which might dictate the course of one who is not at all inclined to invest his property in any ventures of such a hazardous character.—p. 494.

COTTON, L.J.—As to the cases, in Overend, Gurney & Co. v. Gibb, it was sought to make directors liable for making a bargain for which the company was expressly formed. They might have been liable if, knowing that the bargain was very improvident, they had neglected to say so; but there was no such charge against them: there was no charge of negligence pleaded against them. That case, therefore, has no bearing upon this. In Land Credit Co. v. Fermooy (Lord), the person sought to be made liable did not, it is true, know for what purpose the money had been paid; but the cheque had been before the executive committee, who reported that it was a proper payment. That is just the distinction between that case and the present.—p. 209.

LORD DAVEY.—I need only refer to three cases, which seem to me to contain the whole law upon the subject. In Mercantile Trading Co., In re, Stringer's Case, the business of the company in question was of an extremely speculative and hazardous character, and the directors had paid a dividend on their estimated value and assets which were afterwards totally lost. It was held that the estimate having been made bona fide, and without any intention to defraud anybody, a director could not be made liable. When the company was wound up, to replace the money. In Rance's Case, Lord Romilly laid down the principle which he thought governed cases of this description, thus: "When an improper payment has been made, if it be an error of judgment, it cannot be recovered: if it be a fraudulent payment, then it can." The learned judge explained what he meant by a fraudulent payment: "I mean one where the person who makes it, or is concerned in making it, is at the time aware of the impropriety of making it, but does so in order to obtain a benefit for himself;" and he adds, "The director may be ignorant of this fact, but if his ignorance arises from his wilfully shutting his eyes to the facts which are before him, he is equally guilty." I think that this statement of the law is very nearly but not quite accurate. In my opinion it is not necessary that the motive of the improper payment should be to obtain a benefit for the director himself. I also understand Lord Romilly to include in the expression "wilfully shutting his eyes" culpable negligence or reckless indifference by the director in the performance of his duties. The C. A. took a different view of the facts from that taken by Lord Romilly, and held that the directors in the preparation of the so-called balance-sheet had not followed the directions in their articles of association, and the balance-sheet did not in fact purport to show a profit out of which a dividend could be paid. In such a case there can be no doubt of the liability of the director who took part in the payment of the dividend. Leeds Estate, &c. Co. v. Shepherd, before Stirling, J. was a case of the same description. The directors had not followed the directions contained in the articles of association. The learned judge, in the course of his judgment, states the law thus: "It seems to me that the views expressed by the learned judges who decided Rance's Case are consistent with the proposition that directors who are proved to have in fact paid a dividend out of capital fail to excuse themselves if they have not taken reasonable care to secure the preparation of estimates and statements of account such as it was their duty to prepare and submit to the shareholders, and have declared the dividends complained of without having exercised thereon their judgment as mercantile men on the estimates and statements of account submitted to them." I agree in this statement of the law, and I do not think it inconsistent with that of Lord Romilly, properly understood, and subject to the observation which I have already made upon it. It is by this standard that the conduct of the respondent must be judged in this case. . . . I agree with what was said by Sir G. Jessel in Witcham, &c. Co., In re, Hallmark's Case [post, col. 486], and by Chitty, J., in Denham & Co., In re, that directors are not bound to examine entries in the company's books. . . . I desire to express my dissent from some propositions of law which were laid down in the C. A., and upon which this House thought it right to hear the respondent's counsel. . . . It may be that I have misapprehended the statement of law intended to be made by learned judges in the C. A. I think it is possible, because I find that in Vernor v. General and Commercial Trust [post, col. 525], Lord Lindley says: "Perhaps the shortest way of expressing the distinction which I am endeavouring to explain is to say that fixed capital may be sunk and lost, and yet that the excess of current receipts over current payments may be divided, but that floating or circulating capital must be kept up, as otherwise it will enter into and form part of such excess, in which case to divide such excess without deducting the capital which forms part of it will be contrary to law." I reserve my opinion as to the effect of an actual and ascertained loss of part of the company's fixed capital, as in the case put by counsel for the respondent of a loss of a ship uninsured. But, subject to this observation, I think that the statement of law in the passage I have quoted is not open to objection, and it is only because the learned judge appears to me to have departed from it in his judgment in the present case that I have troubled your lordships with these remarks.—pp. 760–762.

Reliance was placed upon a passage in the speech of Lord Cairns; but the result is that he leaves the reasoning of Lord Hatherley in respect of the effect of a clause of this description untouched, reserving a right to reconsider the matter.—p. 411.

is quite a different case from that; there the directors made no representation at all, but the plaintiff had been struck off the register on exactly the same grounds as here, viz., excess of the objects of the company over those stated in the prospectus. He filed a bill against the directors and the company, and the demurrers both of the directors and the company were allowed. True, he did not allege fraud, but if the facts show fraud it is not necessary expressly to call it fraud, nor will the use of the word fraud constitute fraud if the facts do not show it.—p. 552.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, ESHER, M.R. and LOPES, L.J.).—I have carefully worked at the decree in Evans v. Coventry, and I infer that the directors there held liable, not only passed resolutions that were ultra vires, but also acted on them. The decree as to the increased remuneration of the directors only charges each director with what he received. The decree as to dividends paid out of capital appears to me only to charge the directors who declared the dividends, and, in effect, ordered them to be paid. The decree as to the purchase of shares only charges those directors who concurred in the purchases, that is, as I understand, who made them, or ordered them to be made. In Joint Stock Discount Co. v. Brown (supra, col. 431), the directors who were held liable had done much more than the plaintiff did in this case. They were all parties to what James, V.-C. characterised as the "fatal" resolution that the shares improperly bought should not be sold for less than a certain sum. They were therefore implicated in the whole transaction which produced the loss. In Salisbury v. Metropolitan Ry. directors were held liable to make good dividends wrongly paid out of capital; but the point which has to be considered in the present case did not arise there. Reliance was placed by the counsel for the plaintiff on the judgment of Wickens, V.-C. in Pickering v. Stephenson, and followed in Studdert v. Grosvenor. But if a director, acting ultra vires—that is, not only beyond his own power, but also beyond any power the company can confer upon him—parts with money of the company, I fail to see on what principle the fact that he acted bona fide, and with the approval of a majority of the shareholders, can avail him as a defence to an action by the company to compel him to replace the money. I never could understand that part of the V.-C.'s judgment; nor can I understand it now. I think he was wrong.—p. 529.

The words "irregularity in the constitution of the board" did not mean some irregularity in summoning persons who were in fact directors, as the mere non-issue of a notice to a particular director, or not giving him sufficient notice. . . . There had been a meeting where some who were not legally directors were present, and some who were legally directors were excluded, and we decided that it was not a meeting which could discharge the duties of a board.—p. 10.

SIR B. PEACOCK (for self, LORD BLACKBURN, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR M. SMITH and SIR R. COLLIER).—Royal British Bank v. Turquand was decided with reference to a company registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and Jervis, C.J. remarked that the lender finding that the authority might have been made complete by a resolution would have had a right to infer the fact of a resolution authorising that which on the face of the document appeared to be legitimately done. In the present case, however, the bank would have found that, by the articles of association, the directors were expressly restricted from borrowing beyond a certain amount, and they must have known that, if the general powers vested in the directors by art. 50 had been extended or enlarged by a resolution of a general meeting of the shareholders under the provisions of sect. 31, a copy of that resolution ought, in regular course, to have been forwarded to the registrar of joint-stock companies, in pursuance of sect. 53 of the Companies Act, and would have been found amongst his records.—p. 379.

LORD HALSBURY.—The case relied on by the respondents—D'Arcy v. Tamur, &c. Ry. (supra, col. 411)—was a case in which a bond given by a company was held not to be the bond of the company, for this, among other reasons, that, by a section in the company's special Act, the business of the company was to be conducted by directors and by a particular quorum by the special Act prescribed, and it was held that all persons dealing with the company were bound, therefore, to know what was in the provisions of the special Act in respect to that matter. If that case were identical in its facts with the case now before us, we should be bound by that decision, but I think the facts are not the same at all. The decision in Royal British Bank v. Turquand, and . . . Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co., affirm a proposition of a very different character.—p. 452.

LINDLEY, L.J.—That case [D'Arcy v. Tamur, &c. Ry.] has never been applied, that I know of, to these registered companies where the quorum and other formalities depend entirely upon the regulations which the directors may choose to make themselves. The case is governed, not by D'Arcy v. Tamur, &c. Ry., but by Royal British Bank v. Turquand, followed as it has been by a string of cases too numerous to refer to, the principal one of which is the Irish case, Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co., to which Lord Halsbury has referred.—p. 454.

MELLISH, L.J.—The only question is a question of law which was argued by Mr. FRY. He urged that if any one person was discharged, then the whole company might avail themselves of it. I do not at all agree in that. He seemed to think that that was decided by Narva v. Hoylake Ry.; but in that case there was most clearly alleged a contract on behalf of the company, because what was said was that the plaintiff before the application to Parliament induced certain persons to become promoters of the company upon the faith of an express agreement between the plaintiff and the said persons; that he, the plaintiff, would bear and pay all the costs, charges, and expenses of applying for and obtaining and passing the said Act, and in relation thereto; and that neither the said persons, nor the said company when incorporated, nor any other person, should be liable to him for the same or any part thereof. It was, therefore, expressly stated, as part of the agreement, that the company when incorporated should not be liable, and the true ground of the decision is plainly this, that the Court, as a matter of construction, held that the words "charges and expenses," in the Act of Parliament, did not include charges and expenses which a man had voluntarily incurred on the express agreement that he was not to be paid.—p. 673.

MADINS, V.O.—Kelner v. Baxter has no application; for the only point decided in that case was that the persons who had made the contract were liable on it, and could not shift the burden over to the company. Great stress was laid on Melhado v. Porto Allegre, &c. Ry.; but there Lord Coleridge himself says that the decisions at law and in equity are different, and I feel no doubt that that case would have been otherwise decided in equity. Lord Coleridge says that Touche v. Metropolitan Ry. Warehousing Co. rested upon the principle of trustee and cestui que trust, but in my opinion it rested on no such principle, but on the power of a company to adopt contracts made by its promoters after its formation.—p. 369.

JAMES, L.J.—I think it is perhaps as well that we should say that Gregory v. Williams seems to be misunderstood. When that case is considered with the careful criticism with which the M.R. has examined it [Jessel, M.R. discussed this case in the argument], it appears quite clear that there was there a transfer of property with a declaration of trust in favour of a third person, which was a totally different thing from a mere covenant to pay money to that person. . . .

Notwithstanding what was said by Malins, V.C., in Spiller v. Paris Skating Rink Co., it appears to me that it is settled, both in the Courts of law and by us in the C.A. in . . . Hereford and South Wales Waggon, &c. Co., In re, that a company cannot ratify a contract made on its behalf before it come into existence—cannot ratify a nullity. The only thing that results from what is called ratification or adoption of such a contract is not the ratification or adoption of a contract, quid contract, but the creation of an equitable liability depending on equitable grounds. It is inequitable for a man not to pay for the services of which he has taken the benefit.—p. 129.

I may add . . . that in Gregory v. Williams the man with whom the contract was made was one of the plaintiffs, and the only defence then would have been misjoinder of plaintiffs, and that is a defence which the Court is not likely to view with much favour.—p. 130.

COTTON, L.J.—Hereford and South Wales Waggon, &c. Co., In re, was relied on, where it was said that but for the equitable ground of defence there set up Walter and Head would have had a good claim, but in that case the services were not done on the retainer of any other person who was liable to pay for them. In the same way Bramwell, who had been employed by Walter and Head, and urged that the company had taken the benefit of his services, was held to have no claim against the company.—p. 108.

COTTON, L.J.—Of the cases that have been referred to I will notice the last . . . that of Touche v. Metropolitan Ry. Warehousing Co., where there was an arrangement between a promoter of a company and another person that a certain sum should be paid out of the funds of the company to that other person; the company seems to have admitted the arrangement, and in the articles there was a contract or stipulation that the money should be paid to the promoter, in order that the arrangement might be carried out. There Lord Hatherley held that the other person who was to get the money was entitled to sue under that contract. What Lord Hatherley says is this: "The case comes within the authority that, when a sum is payable by A. B. for the benefit of C. D., C. D. can claim under the contract as if it had been made with himself. It is possible that Walker may, as he states in his answer, not be under any personal liability to the plaintiffs; but I think that, on the evidence, the plaintiffs were to be paid when Walker got the money, and they knew that by the articles of the company he was to be paid." Now if that is intended to lay down the rule as a general proposition of law in the general terms there used, it is not consistent with . . . Empress Engineering Co., In re; but it may be that on the facts of the former case it was considered that the contract between Walker and the company was entered into by Walker as a trustee for and on behalf of the plaintiffs; and, if so, that is in accordance with what I understand to be the law. But the late M.R., in Empress Engineering Co., In re, dealing with Touche's Case, said this in the course of the argument: "In that case the L.C. finds, as a fact, that Walker was to receive the money as a trustee for the plaintiffs. If you can make out that Jones and Prde are cestui que trust, that alters the case. It appears to me that they are not. . . ." This shows that the general terms used by Lord Hatherley must be taken with some qualification as laying down the general law.—p. 67. BOWEN and FRY, L.J.J. concurred.

The case subsequently came on before COTTON, BOWEN and FRY, L.J.J., when BOWEN, L.J. (p. 81) discussed Gandy v. Gandy (1882) 51 L. J. P. 41; 7 P. D. 168; 46 L. T. 607; 30 W. R. 673.—C.A. See "HUSBAND AND WIFE."

TURNER, L.J.—Whether the decision in that case is one to be adhered to under all circumstances I need not determine now, but I should require much consideration, before I said anything to impeach that case; I should hesitate long before I gave any opinion at variance with it. This case, however, is not governed by it, because there no question of construction arose in that case and the Act of Parliament provides that a contract such as that now in question may be confirmed.—p. 751.

Riche*. It appears to me to be important that the doctrine of ultra vires, as it was explained in that case, should be maintained.—p. 478.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I take it that, as far as the main point to be considered is concerned, this House has no more right than any other tribunal to depart from the principle of the decisions which have been already arrived at; more particularly I allude to the last case of Ashbury Ry. Co. v. Riche. That case appears to me to decide, at all events, this, that, where there is an Act of Parliament creating a corporation for a particular purpose, and giving it powers for that particular purpose, what it does not expressly or impliedly authorise is to be taken to be prohibited; and, consequently, that the G. E. Co., created by Act of Parliament for the purpose of working a line of railway, is prohibited from doing anything that would not be within that purpose.—p. 481.

LORD WATSON.—I cannot doubt that the principle by which this House, in Ashbury Ry. Co. v. Riche, tested the power of a joint-stock company registered (with limited liability) under the Companies Act, 1862, applies with equal force to the case of a railway company incorporated by Act of Parliament.—p. 486.

BRETT, L.J.—*Ashbury Ry. Carriage, &c. Co. v. But the H. L. did not hold that if money had been lent by directors without authority, the money could not have been recovered, or that the borrowers could set up the defence that those who lent them the money had no authority to do so.—p. 71.

LORD BLACKBURN.—It is not necessary to decide anything as to the effect of Ashbury Co. v. Riche. The course the argument took makes me think it proper to say—though it is quite true, as Mr. Rigby said, that it was not necessary for the decision in Ashbury Co. v. Riche to do more than decide what the law was with regard to a company formed under the Companies Act, 1862—that I think the law there laid down applies to all companies created by any statute for a particular purpose. I think that if I were to confine the effect of the decision to companies created under the Act of 1862, and to say it did not extend to such a corporation as this, I should do wrong. The law is proverbially uncertain. That cannot be helped. But I think I should unjustifiably add to the uncertainty if I set an example of adhering to my previous reasoning (even should I still think it better than that of noble and learned lords who decided against it) in every case not involving precisely the same point. I think Ashbury Co. v. Riche is a binding authority to the extent indicated in Att.-Gen. v. G. E. Ry. (supra).—p. 360.

RIGBY, L.J.—It is said that although the London County Council may not be expressly authorised to run the omnibuses, yet that it is an undertaking so intimately connected with the powers that are expressly given to the council of running the tramways, that under the doctrine mainly depending on the judgment of James, L.J. in Att.-Gen. v. G. E. Ry., it may be treated as tacitly understood as being something belonging to, and so connected with, the other powers which are expressly given as to be really within the statute. It is not to be denied that there are certain things which a statutory corporation may do which are not absolutely mentioned in their Act, but they must be things of a very different degree of importance from what is sought to be done in this case, that is, the running of omnibuses as a separate undertaking; and I cannot read in the observations of James, L.J. anything to authorise the notion that a separate undertaking might be entered upon, merely because it was thought to be convenient for the purposes of the main undertaking. I find no authority for that at all. Indeed, in Colman v. Eastern Counties Ry. (post, col. 468), it might well have been argued that to run steamboats from Harwich to the Continent was most advantageous for the railway, and therefore ought to be taken as impliedly granted to them for the purposes of their undertaking; but Lord Hatherley would not have it at all. He said it was outside the power given to the railway company by the Act of Parliament, and, however advantageous it might be, there was no authority to do it.—p. 373.

STIRLING, J. (after discussing Australian Auxiliary Steam Clipper Co. v. Mounsey and Bryon v. Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co.) said: I do not think that the cases to which I have referred were intended to be overruled by anything that was laid down in Blackburn Benefit Building Society v. Cantliffe Brooks & Co. [(1882) 52 L. J. Ch. 92; 22 Ch. D. 61; 48 L. T. 83; 31 W. R. 98.—C.A. See "BUILDING SOCIETY"], or in Wenlock (Baroness) v. River Dee Co. [(1888) 36 Ch. D. 675, n.—C.A. See "BUILDING SOCIETY"]. The proposition of law which was acted upon in those two cases was thus laid down by Lord Selborne in a single sentence in the former case: "There is also no doubt, that where there is not an express prohibition against borrowing in a case of a company or a society constituted for special purposes, no borrowing can be permitted without express authority, unless it is properly incident to the course and conduct of the business for its proper purposes." In neither of these cases was the company whose powers were the subject of discussion a trading company, and the cases to which I have referred, viz., Australian, &c. Co. v. Monney and Bryon v. Metropolitan, &c. Co., appear to me to show that in the opinion of Lord Hatherley, Kindersley, V.-C. and Turner, L.J., such a borrowing as has taken place here is properly incident to the course of conduct of the business of a trading company for its proper purposes. That being so, it seems to me that I must treat the deposit made by Mr. Thunders as a valid loan to the company. It was competent, therefore, for the company again to borrow money for the purpose of repaying him, and to give security for the advance. That is shown by Patent Fite Co., In re.—p. 442.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—It is not disputed that the authority of Royal British Bank v. Turquand (supra, col. 437) is such that the building society has a right to assume in a case like this that all the essentials of internal management have been carried out by the borrowing company, and that the building society is only bound if the law properly imputes to it knowledge of these irregularities which have been committed. The case, therefore, comes to this: Is it right to impute such knowledge in this case? Counsel for the land company shrink from saying that in all cases where one person is an officer common to two societies, this knowledge is to be imputed to both societies. It was impossible, having regard to the decision in Marseilles Extension Ry., In re, that they could successfully contend for so wide a proposition. Both the L.J.J. in that case were of opinion that there might be cases in which the personal knowledge of a common officer did not affect both companies. When one has read the judgments in that case, which negative any general proposition that the knowledge of a common officer is always the knowledge of both companies, one has to ask oneself, What is the line that has to be drawn, or what is the test to be applied, in order to see when the knowledge of the common officer is the knowledge of both companies? It seems to me broadly that the L.J.J. do draw the line that knowledge acquired by the officer of one company will not be imputed to the other company unless the common officer of both had some duty imposed upon him to communicate that knowledge to the other company, and had some duty imposed upon him by the second company to receive notice thereof. I think this view of the case is confirmed by a consideration of Gule v. Lewis. In that case the jury found that the common agent was authorised by the company sought to be affected with notice to receive the notice that was given by him as the officer of the company; and that being so, Lord Denman said: "It was further contended that Densham communicated to Loosemore in his capacity of attorney, and not as agent for the insurance office, but where the two capacities are united in one person, a notice received in one capacity for the purpose of being transmitted in the other is an effectual notice in both capacities." Of course you must add to the statement of Lord Denman the finding of the jury that the company did authorise Loosemore to receive notice. That addition seems to me to make it quite plain that both in Marseilles Extension Ry., In re, and Gule v. Lewis the test applied by the Court was—first, was it within the scope of the duty of one company's officer to give notice to the other company? Secondly, was it within the scope of his duty as the officer of the other company to receive such notice? That is certainly not the case here.—p. 862.

ROMER, J.—The holder of a debenture constituting a floating security only while the company is carrying on its business, and when no steps have been taken to wind up the company or to get a receiver appointed, cannot single out a particular debt due to the company and require by notice that debt to be paid to him, or not to be paid to the company, or to those validly claiming through the company. See the observations of Stirling, J. in Hubbuck v. Helms. . . Those [Standard Manufacturing Co., In re, and Opera, Ltd., In re] were cases of execution creditors, and in both the winding up of the company commenced before the sheriff sold, and therefore before the execution was completed—in other words, before the assets seized by the execution creditors had been completely dealt with so as to give any rights therein to the creditors.—p. 461.

NORTH, J.—Now is the covering deed a debenture or not? In Edmonds v. Blava Furnaces Co. (col. 447) and in Levy v. Abercrombie Slate and Slab Co. (col. 447), Chitty, J. pointed out some of the distinguishing qualities of a debenture, and personally I do not see why this document is not a debenture. It was, however, held by Field, J. in chambers in Brooklehurst v. Ry. Printing and Publishing Co., W.N. (1884) 70, that a covering deed was not a debenture. In Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., the C.A. proceeded on the admission that the covering deed was not a debenture. In this conflict of authority I do not feel called on to decide the point. It is immaterial whether the deed is a debenture or not. It is quite clear that it is not a bill of sale, and that it does not require registration as a bill of sale. No doubt in Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co. the C.A. assumed that the covering deed ought to have been registered, and was void because it was not registered. Cotton, L.J. said in that case: "Undoubtedly, the covering deed being void, we cannot look at it as a contract to give security." But he did not say it was void. His words merely amounted to saying, "Assuming it to be void"; and Lindley, L.J. said: "It is said now that the debentures are void because the (covering) deed is admitted on all hands to be void under the Bills of Sale Act." He then proceeded to consider the debentures, and held they were not void. No doubt he assumed the covering deed to be void. But in Standard Manufacturing Co., In re, the matter was fully considered. It is sufficient to read the headnote, which is fully borne out by the judgments. It runs thus: "The mortgages or charges of any incorporated company for the registration of which statutory provision has already been made by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not upon the true construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, bills of sale within the scope of that Act." Now, this covering deed is one for the registration of which provision has been made by the Companies Act, 1862. The decision is exactly in point, and the covering deed is not a bill of sale.—p. 507. LORD MACNAGHTEN (for self, HERSCHELL, L.C., LORDS WATSON, HOBHOUSE, SHAND and DAVEY and SIR R. COCHRAN).—The power of a company limited by shares to charge uncalled capital has been the subject of several reported cases in this country. The Court seems almost always to have regarded such a charge with disfavour. Whenever the question has arisen, borrowing powers have been construed strictly and sometimes perhaps rather narrowly. But no case was cited to their lordships in which any judge has ever held it to be beyond the powers of a limited company to create a charge upon its uncalled capital. British Provident Fire Assurance Co., In re, Stanley's Case, in 1864 (supra), goes further in that direction than any other. There Knight Bruce and Turner, LJJ., laid great stress on the difficulty of enforcing a charge on uncalled capital owing to the discretionary power of making calls which the company's deed of settlement entrusted to the directors; and they seem to intimate that, assuming the borrowing powers of the company to have extended to future calls, it would have been a breach of trust on the part of the directors to give effect to the charge, though created by their own act under the authority of the company—a proposition which is somewhat difficult to follow. The decision, however, turned entirely upon the construction of the deed of settlement. There was power to charge "the property or funds" of the company.

It was held that that expression did not include future calls. "They are property," said Turner, L.J., "not of the society immediately, but which may be called up by the directors of the society at their discretion." The context too was relied on as showing that the property intended to be charged was property capable of being "assigned, transferred, conveyed, or surrendered." British Provident Society, In re, Stanley's Case, was approved and followed by this Board in Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams (supra), where the judgment was delivered by James, L.J. But there the difficulty in connection with the discretionary power of the directors in regard to calls was treated merely as an argument against implying a power to charge future calls where the language of the instrument was doubtful. And it certainly seems to be assumed in the judgment that by "apt and proper words or a sufficient context," a power to charge uncalled capital may be conferred. In Phoenix Bessemer Steel Co., In re (supra), the M.R. (Sir G. Jessel) said: "There can be no doubt that the power can be given to a company by the articles of association." He brushed aside the difficulty which weighed so much with the L.J.J., observing that to his mind it was no difficulty at all, and referring to the case of companies governed by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Where such companies have power to create mortgages, the statute itself confers upon them, as incidental to that power, a power to charge future calls. The decision in Phoenix Bessemer Steel Co., In re, was in 1875. During the last twenty years Sir G. Jessel's opinion has been followed in many cases, and many securities have been given and taken on the faith of it. Kay, J. adopted the same view in Howard v. Kent Ivory Manufacturing Co. (supra), which was decided in 1888. More recently still, in 1890, the question came before the C.A. in Pyle Works, In re. After examining all the previous authorities and discussing the matter very fully, Cotton and Lindley, L.J.J. upheld a charge on uncalled capital. They found nothing in the Act expressed or implied to prevent or avoid such a security. Lopes, L.J. with some hesitation concurred in the judgment. The main argument against the validity of the charge was that it seemed to contravene the directions of the Act in regard to the application of monies recovered from contributories in the winding up. But the answer was obvious. The liability of a contributory as a present member to pay calls in the winding up is not a liability springing into existence for the first time on the company going into liquidation. It is merely the ripening of that liability which the contributory undertook when he became a member.—p. 59.

LINDLEY, L.J.—When Pyle Works, In re, was decided I foresaw that the decision might be pressed further than I was prepared to go, and

I pointed out that, in my opinion, it did not authorise mortgages of reserve capital formed under the Act of 1879. . . . With respect to Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Co. . . . I need only observe that it was not a decision on the Act of 1879, but a decision on an article of association, so worded as not to preserve, nor indeed to show any intention to preserve, the reserve capital for the benefit of the general creditors in the event of liquidation. I cannot regard that case as an authority against the view I take of the Act of 1879.—p. 341. RIGBY, L.J. concurred.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think if [the introduction of a clause in the memorandum of association as to reserve capital] would have this effect by negating quid this portion of the capital the implication of a power to mortgage, just as Knight Bruce and Turner, L.J.J., held in Stanley's Case (col. 450) that the necessary discretion of the directors from time to time to make calls negated the implication of a power to mortgage or assign uncalled capital. It is true that the inference of the L.J.J. must be taken to be overruled by Pyle Works, In re; but the principle that you may negative such implication by an intent drawn from the terms of the memorandum is not overruled.—p. 343.

JESSEL, M.R.—I cannot say in this case that I disagree with the V.-C., for in fact the appeal has been occasioned by his agreeing with a decision of mine in Norton v. Florence Land and Public Works Co., but it should be known in the first place that I had not before me on that occasion the articles of association, nor were they relied on in the argument, and I had to construe the bond or obligation, or whatever it is to be called, as well as I could without any such articles. In the next place I wish to say this, that I adhere to every word I then said, except with respect to a passage at the top line of p. 338 in the report. I think there is a slip in that passage, whether made by me or the reporter I cannot say. I ought to have said—and I now think that I intended to say—"themselves, their successors and assigns;" and if those words are substituted for the words "estate, property, and effects" the judgment will be found consistent. Having read at the bottom of p. 337 all the words, I first dealt with the first half of the sentence, and then in p. 338 I dealt with the second half. But, with that correction, I entirely adhere to what I then said. . . . But as regards the question we have now to decide, on what appears to me very different materials, I have arrived at a different conclusion from what I did in the case of Norton v. Florence Land and Public Works Co.; and I do not think it at all material to discuss whether the conclusion I have arrived at now is or is not consistent with my former decision.—p. 536.

GIFFARD, L.J.—A class of cases has been referred to on that subject [equitable debt], the principal of which are German Mining Co., In re, and Cork and Youghal Ry., In re, the latter of which was before the L.C. and myself a short time ago; I have no hesitation in saying that those cases have gone quite far enough, and that I am not disposed to extend them. They were decided upon a principle, recognised in old cases beginning with Marlow v. Pigfield ([1719] 1 P. Wms 558), where there was a loan to an infant, and the money was spent in paying for necessities, and in another case of a more modern date, where there was money actually lent to a lunatic, and it went in paying expenses which were necessary for the lunatic. In such cases it has been held, that, although the party lending the money could maintain no action, yet, inasmuch as his money had gone to pay debts which would be recoverable at law, he could come into a Court of equity and stand in the place of those creditors whose debts had been so paid. That is the principle of those cases. It is a very clear and definite principle, and a principle which ought not to be departed from.—p. 313.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is quite obvious that Mr. Brasnett is liable to pay these calls. It is also quite obvious that when the winding-up commenced he had no right to a set-off, or to anything else that I can discover. He may have acquired a right against the company in respect of that 500*l.*, but his right, if any, against the company, in respect of that sum, is by no means established yet. I am not at all satisfied that he has any right. He may have—I do not say that he has not—but I am quite sufficiently familiar with German Mining Co., In re, to know that nothing would be more dangerous than to assume that that case applies to a director who has paid money for what he is pleased to call the benefit of the company. The principle of that case requires to be applied with the very greatest caution, and, when one looks at that case closely, one finds that it proceeded on the principle that the money which the company had ultimately to repay had been applied in discharging debts which the company was liable to pay. The liability does not depend on the mere fact that the money has been borrowed of the bankers—that is no debt at all in law—but in the fact that the money itself has been applied in discharge of debts and liabilities which might otherwise have been enforced against the company in another way. I doubt very much whether Mr. Brasnett will, when the case is closely investigated, bring himself within that case. I am not at all sure that this debt of 500*l.* was ever a debt of the company, or that the money which it represents has been applied in discharging debts or liabilities of the company in such a way that German Mining Co., In re, applies. I do not say it was not so applied, but it is not established that it was. Sect. 101 of the Companies Act, 1862, was not considered in German Mining Co., In re, and it appears to me that all we can do is to order this gentleman to pay that which is due from him, without prejudice to any question as to his right to prove in respect of the 500*l.*—p. 571.

Headnote.—Where a firm, one of whose members was a director of a company in course of winding-up, had advanced money to the company on the security of a transfer of delivery warrants of iron, and the warrants were transferred to the director-partner, but it was established on the evidence that the security ensured to the benefit of the firm, and there was no entry of the transaction on the register of mortgages of the company as required by sect. 43 of the Companies Act, 1862, it was held by Jessel, M.R. and Bramwell, L.J. (affirming Hall, V.-C.), Baggallay, L.J. dissenting, that the doctrine of the above two cases did not apply, and that the security was not forfeited.

LORD WATSON.—The rule in question was first laid down by Malins, V.-C. in Wynn Hall Coal Co., In re, and was thus explained by that learned judge: "In this case the mortgagees are the directors, who have committed an illegal act by not registering the mortgage, and, upon the strict construction of the language of the Act, I think they are precluded from setting up the mortgage. But independently of the language of the Act, I am of opinion that, upon general principles, it cannot be permitted that directors who get a charge on the property of the company and omit to register it, but keep it as a pocket security concealed from the creditors, should set it up against the general creditors." A decision of Lord Romilly to the same effect in Valpy and Chaplin, In re, was upheld by James, L.J., sitting alone. "Every one," the L.J., said, "standing in a fiduciary position to the company is bound to see that the company obeys the directions of the legislature: and I am of opinion that the failure of the appellant to do so is fatal in his case." Next followed Native Iron Ore Co., In re, in which a similar decision of the vice-warden of the Stannaries was affirmed by the C. A., consisting of James, Mellish and Baggallay, L.J.J., all of whom were of the opinion expressed by Mellish, L.J., that the rule established by the two preceding cases was "founded on a perfectly good equitable principle." These are the decisions upon which the rule at present rests. In several subsequent cases the late M.R. (Sir G. Jessel) expressed very strong disapproval of it. He did so in Borough of Hackney Newspaper Co., In re (supra), and also in International Pulp and Paper Co., In re. In the first of these cases he held that directors who had realised their security before the commencement of the winding-up could not be compelled to refund the proceeds, inasmuch as they had not "knowingly and wilfully authorised or permitted the omission" to enter their mortgage on the register; and in the second, he decided that the sub-mortgagee of a director was not affected by the want of registration. In South Durham Iron Co., In re, Hall, V.-C. decided that the rule in Native Iron Ore Co., In re, did not apply to a mortgage made to partners, of whom one only was a director of the company; and his decision was affirmed in the C. A. by the M.R. and Bramwell, L.J., Baggallay, L.J., dissenting. Bramwell, L.J., whilst recognising the authority of Valpy and Chaplin, Ex parte, and Native Iron Ore Co., In re, as binding on the C. A., did not conceal his disapproval of the principle laid down in these cases. In Globe, &c. Co., In re, the late M.R. again took the opportunity of reviewing the previous decisions, and of delivering an elaborate argument against the rule which they established. I do not think any one of the learned judges who have supported the rule adopts the first reason assigned by Malins, V.-C. in Wynn Hall Coal Co., In re. I do not think it can be reasonably affirmed that the rule has been enacted, either expressly or impliedly, by the legislature in sect. 43 of the Companies Act, 1862, or that it could be sustained in equity apart from the provisions of that section. . . . As I understand the decisions of the C. A., the foundation of the rule is the neglect of the director or other official to discharge his statutory duty, which raises, or is supposed to raise, in equity, a personal disability which precludes him from enforcing his charge upon the property of the company, in competition with any creditor who is not in the same position with himself. I have come to the conclusion that the effect of the rule is to inflict upon persons who may fail to perform the duty imposed upon them by sect. 43, severe penal consequences which the legislature has not enacted and cannot be held to have contemplated. The creation of such penalties, in addition to the pecuniary mulct which the legislature has thought fit to attach to the wilful neglect of the statutory duty of registration, is, in my opinion, altogether beyond the functions of a Court of equity. I do not think it necessary to explain in detail the reasons which have held me to that conclusion. They are all to be found in the judgment delivered by the late M.R. in Globe, &c. Co., In re, in which I entirely concur, subject to the observation that it appears to me to be, in some passages, expressed in terms more forcible than the occasion required.—p. 878.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This decision in no way conflicts with the decisions of this Court in George Newman & Co., In re (supra, col. 425), or in Broderip v. Salomon & Co. The company is recognised as a corporate body distinct from Prince, and there are no proceedings against Prince as there were against Salomon, entitling the company to set aside the agreement for the sale of the business to acquire which the company was formed, or to be indemnified by the vendor against the debts which were endeavoured to saddle the company with. No such fraud as was proved in Salomon's Case is proved in this case, and on the materials before us the plaintiff is entitled to the usual judgment in a debenture-holder's action, with costs of the appeal.—p. 750.

NORTH, J.—Kay, J. [Blaker v. Herts and Essex Waterworks Co.] declared the plaintiffs entitled to a charge upon the company's undertaking, and directed an inquiry who were the debenture-holders and what was due to each of them, and he appointed a receiver, but declined to order a sale of the undertaking or to appoint a manager. He acted apparently upon the principles laid down in the well-known case of Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry. He did not dismiss the action, but he made an order in the terms which I have mentioned. The present case is one in which a winding-up order ought certainly to be made, unless the fact that the company's undertaking is for the carrying out of a public object is a sufficient reason for not making it. In my opinion that is not a sufficient reason. . . . It may be necessary to obtain an Act of Parliament to authorise the sale of the undertaking. . . . The order which I am now asked to make will be equivalent to the judgment which Kay, J. pronounced in the case to which I have referred. By appointing an official liquidator I shall not be taking the management of the undertaking out of the hands of the company; I shall be appointing an officer of the Court to carry on the undertaking for the company, and in the interests of the shareholders. . . . I do not forget that in Free Fishermen of Faversham, In re (post, col. 560), the C. A. refused to make a winding-up order. But there the company was a very peculiar one, as there was a right of fishery in the individual members of the company; and the ground of the decision was, that no good could result from the making of a winding-up order. If I thought that in the present case, I should refuse to make the order. . . . In that case the company had been carrying on their business for a very long time, and there was no reason for putting an end to it. —pp. 587–590.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The undertaking on the security of which the money was borrowed has in fact come to an end by the winding-up, and this circumstance entitles the debenture-holders to realise their security. This point was determined in Hodson v. Tea Co., which was itself based on the earlier case of Panama, &c. Mail Co., In re. In Hodson v. Tea Co. the debenture was not due, but it was treated as having become due on the commencement of the winding-up of the company, and accounts were directed of what was due for principal and interest on that footing. The principle on which that decision is founded is, in my opinion, correct, and the plaintiff is in my opinion entitled to an order to give effect to it. —p. 600.

KAY, J.—The matter came before a very experienced judge, the late M.R., in Peck v.

Trinsmaran Iron Co., and there, although there was no opposition, there being an application by a holder of a debenture bond whereby all the company's effects and machinery were charged, and the motion was for both a receiver and manager, the late M.R. said: "I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to secure the property in the only way in which it can be made secure, as otherwise it may go to ruin. I know of no authority bearing on the question, but on principle I consider that they are entitled to have a manager appointed." The opinion of the late M.R. in a question of this kind is of very considerable authority, and it has been followed in another case before Chitty, J. [Campbell v. Lloyds', Barnett's and Bosanquet's Bank (1889)]. Certainly it is remarkable that the case before the late M.R. is not referred to either in Mr. Buckley's work on Companies, or in Lindley, L.J.'s well-known work. However there is authority for such an application, and I am justified in following it; but I should be very glad if the question were brought to the attention of the C. A. and the matter authoritatively settled. —p. 165.

CAIRNS, L.C. (after discussing Agra and Masterman's Bank, In re) said: That decision would not, however, have any application to a question arising upon a single instrument like the debenture now before the Court. The other case upon which the M.R. founded his decision was Blakely Ordnance Co., In re. . . . So far as the form of the debenture is concerned, the debenture there bears a considerable similarity to the debentures in the case now before the Court; but there were other facts in that case which do not occur in the present. The debentures in that case were given in pursuance of the terms of an antecedent contract entered into between Mr. Blakely and Mr. Dent and the company. That contract was to this effect: an agreement was entered into in June, 1855, between Blakely and Dent of the one part, and Mr. Hardwick of the other part, for the sale to the company, which was then projected, of certain property belonging to Blakely and Dent for a large sum of money, part of which was to be paid by the issue and delivery to Blakely and Dent, immediately on the establishment of the company, of debentures to the amount of 150,000*l.*, which were to be payable to bearer, the capital to be repayable to bearer at the end of three years from the date of the agreement. The question was raised whether the issuing of a debenture, professing to be payable to bearer and to be negotiable as money, would in a fiscal point of view, be competent to a company of this kind; but, without dwelling on that question, it is perfectly clear . . . that the bargain which Blakely and Dent made was that, so far as the company could do it, debentures which were to be payable to bearer, and therefore to be treated as money, were to be given to them. Rolt, L.J., finding that this was a contract, finding also that the contract was embodied in the articles of association, and that the company was formed to give effect to it, came to the conclusion that the company were estopped from setting up, upon a claim by holders of these debentures to prove for the amounts specified in them, any equity or right of set-off which it might have against Blakely and Dent, to whom the debentures were originally given. That was a case, therefore, depending on the special circumstances of the antecedent contract, to which I have already referred.—p. 364.

LOPES, L.J.—It [Liberator Building Society, In re] was not the case of a banking company but of a building society. It is true that Cave, J. in the course of his judgment, says: "It seems to me that more because he was appointed solicitor to the society, without more, the solicitor does not become an officer of the society, any more than it has been held that a banker does if he is appointed banker to the society, or a broker if he is appointed broker to the society, or the auditor if he is appointed auditor to the society." I do not think that his attention was drawn to the word "mistakeance"; but, however that may have been, the case which had to be decided was not the case of an auditor, but the case of a solicitor.—p. 869

LORD HERSCHHELL.—I desire to retain absolute liberty of action, in case it should hereafter become necessary, with regard to the question whether London and General Bank, In re, was rightly decided. . . . All that we decide is that, in a case identical with London and General Bank, In re, as I take this to be in substance, the auditor is an officer. We decide that as bound by the previous decision of the C. A. Beyond that our decision does not go. I say this because some general observations were made by the learned judge in the Court below, as to which I desire to express no opinion.—p. 151.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Three points of distinction have been alluded to. The first is, that in London and General Bank, In re, the auditors were officers by statute; but it was pointed out by the counsel for the respondent that, although that was so, in substance Table A. was incorporated in the articles of the bank. The next point was, that the articles of the bank contained a definite clause which included auditors as officers, whereas no such clause existed in the present case; and the third point was that the indemnity clause in the articles of the bank referred to directors, auditors, and other officers, whereas the indemnity clause in the present case does not mention auditors. In my opinion we should be frittering away the judgment in London and General Bank, In re, if we were to attempt to distinguish the present case from it. Being bound by that decision, I say that in any case which comes within the terms of that case the auditor is an officer of the company. Further than that I am not prepared to go on the present occasion.—p. 161.

LINDLEY, L.J.—If sect. 10 of the Winding-up Act, 1890, contained the word "auditor," it might well be that Messrs. Parsons and Robtjen, having acted as they did, could not be heard to say that they were not auditors, and sect. 10 might very well apply to them. But the word "auditor" is not in the section. . . . If all persons who did auditor's work for a company were officers of the company, the case would be easy; but no decision has yet gone this length, and if that were the law the careful examination of the Acts of Parliament and articles of association made in London and General Bank, In re, and Kingston Cotton Mill Co., In re, would have been quite unnecessary. An auditor may or may not be an officer of a company. So may anybody else—for example, a banker or solicitor. Prima facie such persons are not officers—see as to bankruptcy, Imperial Land Co. of Marseilles, In re (supra, col. 457), and as to solicitors, Carter's Case (supra, col. 457). But if appointed to an office under the company, and if they act in that office as officers of the company, they will be officers within sect. 10—Liberator Building Society, In re (supra)—and no irregularity in their appointment would, I conceive, avail them. . . . In my opinion Stirling, J. has regarded the decisions in London and General Banking Co., In re, and Kingston Cotton Mill Co., In re, as going considerably further than they did. They decided two points only—namely, first, that auditors might be officers within sect. 10—a proposition which, in the first case, was very stoutly disputed; and secondly, that the auditors in those cases were officers of the companies there in question—that is, that the persons there held to be within sect. 10 really filled the office of auditor in those cases respectively.—p. 356.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first case which is relied upon is Gibson v. Barton, where Blackburn and Lush, J.J. held (Quain, J. dissenting) . . . that "manager" in the Act [Companies Act, 1862, s. 27] meant manager de facto, and that a person who performed manager's work became thereby manager; but how does this establish that a person who performs auditor's work becomes an officer of the company? If the words of the section had included the word "auditor," the case would have been applicable, but no such word is in the section. I agree that performing the work of an auditor shows the person to be a de facto, though he may not be a de jure, auditor; but to succeed the liquidator must show that the person is a de facto "officer." . . . The next case is Corycatty and Dixon's Case (supra, col. 423). There two directors did the work of directors without being qualified to be directors. Sir G. Jessel held them to be de facto directors though they were not de jure directors, and as such were liable to be proceeded against summarily by way of misfeasance summons as being directors of the company, who are persons designated in the section to be proceeded against. When this case was under appeal (it was reversed upon another point), Bramwell, L.J. said, "if he"—that is, the director—"has done anything wrong as a de facto director, no doubt he can be got at under the clause." In this I agree, and if Messrs. Parsons and Robtjen had done anything wrong as de facto officers they could be got at; but they have done nothing of the sort, for the simple reason that they have never become officers of the company at all. When examined, Corycatty and Dixon's Case is only Gibson v. Barton over again.—p. 357.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The third ground of defence was that the only remedy was rescission. That defence, in the circumstances of the present case, seems to me to be as contrary to common-sense as it is to authority. The point was settled

JAMES, L.J.—The great principle laid down in Mozley v. Alston and Foss v. Harbottle was, that whatever should be done by the company itself through its own internal organisation, ought to be left to the company, and ought not to be interfered with by this Court. In the cases which have been cited [Atwood v. Merryweather and Featherstone v. Cooke], and upon the statement of which the V.-C. [Malins, V.-C.] seems to have altered his original opinion, there was a doubt whether the legal proceedings had been authorised by the company; and the Court said that a meeting ought to be summoned in order to ascertain whether the company desired its name to be continued as plaintiff or defendant. . . . That is not a direction to call a meeting for any purpose connected with the management of the company, or to do anything which the company could do for itself according to its own organisation—p. 608. MELLISH, L.J. concurred.

JAMES, L.J.—I think it is of the utmost importance in all these companies that the rule which is well known in this Court as the rule in Mozley v. Alston, Lord v. Copper Miners' Co., and Foss v. Harbottle, should be always adhered to, that is to say, that nothing connected with internal disputes between the shareholders is to be made the subject of a bill by one shareholder on behalf of himself and others, unless there be something illegal, oppressive or fraudulent, something ultra vires on the part of the company, quod company, or on the part of the majority of the company, so that they are not fit persons to determine it; but that every litigation must be in the name of the company, if the company really desire to entertain it.—p. 32.

MELLISH, L.J.—Is it not better that the rule should be, if it is a thing which the majority are masters of, that the majority in substance shall be entitled to have their will followed? That, as I understand it, is what has been decided by Mozley v. Alston and Foss v. Harbottle. In my opinion that is the rule that is to be maintained.—p. 35. BAGGALLAY, J.A. concurred.

JESSEL, M.R.—In Duckett v. Gover the company were not joined as co-plaintiffs by an oversight of the pleader, and I allowed the case to stand over for a fortnight to enable the plaintiff to obtain the consent of the company, and he got it. LINDLEY, M.R.—The breach of duty to the company consists in depriving the company of the use of the money which the directors ought to have paid up [on their shares] sooner than they did. I cannot regard the case as one of mere internal management, which, according to Foss v. Harbottle, and numerous other cases, the Court leaves the shareholders to settle amongst themselves. It was ascertained and admitted at the trial that, when this action was commenced, the defendants held such a preponderance of shares that they could not be controlled by the other shareholders. Under these circumstances an action by some of the shareholders on behalf of themselves and others against the defendants is in accordance with the authorities, and is unobjectionable in form—see Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Co. (supra). An action in this form is far preferable to an action in the name of the company and then a fight as to the right to use the name. But this last mode of procedure is the only other open to a minority of shareholders in cases like the present.—p. 433.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—A great deal has been said about the decision of the Court in Southall v. British, &c. Society, and it has been rather argued that the decision of the M.R. and James and Mellish, L.J.J. respectively in that case was a decision that there was nothing which would render invalid a resolution of the majority of the shareholders giving a bonus to the servants of the company, never mind what was the motive of giving the bonus. I do not think myself that Southall v. British, &c. Society decides anything of the sort. James, L.J., in dealing with this matter, says: "I agree that if this had been done secretly, in all probability it could not be supported. But it was done openly, and appeared on the face of the agreement. There was nothing in itself wrong in such an arrangement, and it was known to all the shareholders. . . . All that I understand that the L.J. is saying there is that, if the circumstances are such as not to import any impropriety in the gift which is being made by the shareholders of the company by the resolution of its officers, there is no reason why that resolution should be treated as an invalid resolution. I do not understand him to mean that such a resolution would be valid if it had been passed under different circumstances. . . . If it does turn out in fact that really this money was a real bonus given by the purchasing company to the directors of the selling company in consideration of the directors of the selling company facilitating the contract, I wish to say emphatically on my part that there is nothing, in my opinion, in the judgments in Southall v. British, &c. Society which says that the majority of the shareholders can bind the minority in respect of such a matter as that. I do not want to go in detail into a case which in many respects is a different one from the present, but as I understand the majority of the Court in Hutton v. West Cork Ry. (supra, col. 419), that is, the majority of the C.A., although deciding the case upon another ground, upon the ground that the company there had already gone into liquidation, do, as does Fry, J., affirm this proposition which I have been attempting to state here—that is, that these are matters which are intra vires, but yet are of such a character that the majority cannot bind the minority, even though the notice itself might be in due form.—p. 281.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that Alexander v. Simpson is an entirely different case. There an extraordinary general meeting was summoned, and in the notice summoning that meeting (it is not the first time, in my experience, I have seen it) it was notified that if the resolutions were passed another extraordinary general meeting would be held on a certain day to confirm those resolutions. The C. A. held that that was not sufficient; that the shareholder was entitled to know, not whether a meeting would be held in a certain event, but whether it would be held as a certainty; he was entitled to be told after the resolutions were passed that they would be confirmed on a certain date. . . . Here there was a separate notice convening the confirmatory meeting—and that is, no doubt, to some extent, in the alternative; that is to say, there were two schemes put before the meeting—a new scheme which had only been mentioned at the first meeting, and the old scheme, which had been provisionally established at the first meeting: and if that new scheme was passed the scheme which had received the approval of the first extraordinary general meeting would, of course, be out of the question altogether, and to that extent there was a conditional element about it. . . . I think that the shareholder had ample notice of what was intended to be done, that there was nothing conditional to affect his mind, and that Alexander v. Simpson does not apply to such a case as that.—p. 358.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The case differs wholly from *Kaye v. BACON, V.-C.—Mr Marten referred to the 51st section of the Companies Act, 1862, which enacts that there must be an interval of not less than fourteen days between the meeting at which a special resolution, such as this for the increase of capital, is passed, and the meeting at which that resolution is confirmed. Here the interval was not sufficient. The meetings were held on the 3rd and 17th January, thus leaving an interval of thirteen days, and that is not enough. The interval should have been fourteen clear days, exclusive of the days of meeting; and on the authority of Chitty, J. (Ry. Sleepers Supply Co., In re) such a defect is fatal. Now, if the dispute here was simply between the company and its shareholders and directors, undoubtedly that would be so; but that is not the case I have now to deal with. Such an objection as that which is now raised does not apply where the creditors of the company are concerned.—p. 214.

[The dicta cited in argument were: "We must import into the case our common knowledge that where a poll is demanded it never is taken there and then, and I am by no means of opinion that a chairman could direct it to be so taken"—per Jessel, M.R.; and "You will have some difficulty in persuading me that if a poll is demanded, a chairman can appoint it to be held there and then without notice to anybody not present."—per Brett, L.J.]

KAY, J.—Is it the usual custom—is it the universal custom—at public meetings to defer, when a poll is asked for, the taking of the poll to an adjourned meeting? If so, I confess I was not aware of it. However, I do not profess to set up my own personal knowledge as worth anything in such a matter, particularly when I find that in . . . Horbury Bridge Coal, &c. Co., In re, the late M.R. and the present M.R. are stated to have made the observations which have been quoted. The point, however, to which those observations were addressed did not arise for decision in that case, and was not decided: and although it seems to have been argued that a poll could have been taken then and there, no case on the subject was cited. But a case has been cited to me of Reg. v. D'Oyly [(1840) 12 A. & E. 139; 4 P. & D. 52; 4 Jur. 1056. See "ECCLÉSIASTICAL LAW"] where the point arose distinctly, and where, after considerable argument, Lord Denman gave judgment upon it. I see that Sir J. Campbell, Att.-Gen., Mr. Thesiger, and Mr. Swann were on one side, and Sir F. Pollock, Mr. Cresswell, and Mr. Hayes on the other side. The meeting upon which the question arose in that case was a vestry meeting summoned by churchwardens for the purpose of electing new churchwardens, and Lord Denman in his judgment said (12 A. & E. 158): "The meeting being held, and a show of hands taken, some one was to declare on whom the nomination had fallen. Who was to do that? Not the body of the parishioners who had made the nomination, nor the old churchwardens, but the person presiding at the vestry, namely, the rector. A poll is then demanded; and it is demandable as of right; and the president of the meeting is the person to grant it. In the absence of other business the poll should be taken immediately: if time does not allow of that, there must be an adjournment for the purpose. Then who is to direct the adjournment? It is suggested that a majority of the voters should do so. But how is the majority to be ascertained in so large a constituency?" Then he goes on to say that it is not a matter for the majority to decide upon whether there should be an adjournment or not, but the question is one which ought to be decided by the president of the meeting. I take that to be a statement, after considerable argument, by a very eminent judge of what the common law is with reference to meetings and the mode of holding them, and what is the legal course to take when a poll is demanded. And I confess I was surprised to find that it had ever been suggested with regard to a meeting held under the Companies Act, 1862, under a rule in the words of the 43rd article of Table A, that a poll demanded at a meeting of that kind could not, if the chairman so directed, be taken at that meeting. It seems to me, with great respect to the dicta which have been cited to me, that that is not law. The law is distinct that a poll can be taken at that same meeting.—p. 162.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for Court, LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.J.J.).—The same view [as Chitty, J.'s] was taken by KAY, J. in Caloric Engine Co., In re, and by the C.A. in Horbury Bridge Coal, &c. Co., In re. It is true that the only point decided in this last case was that on a show of hands shares ought not to be counted. No one suggested that absentees should be counted as present, but the observations of Sir G. Jessel, M.R. on the mode of voting by show of hands are clearly against the propriety of so counting them. In Bidwell Bros., In re, V. WILLIAMS, J. however, decided that on a show of hands absent members entitled to vote by proxy ought to be counted as present if their proxy is himself present and votes. We agree that this is true if the proxy is a non-member and represents only one person—namely, the absentee for whom he votes. The proxy's vote must be counted, and that vote is in effect the vote of the absentee. But to hold that on a show of hands a proxy has more than one vote is to introduce a mode of voting never heard of in practice, and not, in our opinion, required by law. Section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, is a reproduction of sect. 34 of the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1857, and if V. WILLIAMS, J.'s decision is right, a practice which has prevailed ever since 1856, if not for even a longer period, will have been improper. Such a conclusion makes it necessary to examine the grounds on which it is based with great care and some suspicion; and for the reasons above stated we have come to the conclusion that the decision in Bidwell Bros., In re, is erroneous, and ought not to be followed.—p. 21. And see post, col. 476.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—I think the legislature intended, in the case of a special or extraordinary resolution, that the chairman's declaration should be conclusive unless challenged by means of a poll demanded by five members. This view, however, is directly contrary to that expressed by KEKEWICH, J. in Young v. South African, &c. Development Syndicate. . . . KEKEWICH, J. was under the impression that the point arose before him for the first time. His attention was not called to Gold Co., In re, which is reported 11 Ch. D. 701, but is more fully reported 48 L. J. Ch. 281. In that case only seventeen shareholders were present. Eleven voted for the extraordinary resolution to wind up voluntarily, two against it, and four did not vote at all. No poll was demanded, and the chairman declared the resolution to be carried. It seems plain that this was a mistake, for there was not the requisite three-fourths majority. Malins, V.-C. treated the voluntary winding up as valid, but nevertheless made a compulsory order. In the C.A. this order was reversed. It appears from the Law Journal report, p. 286, that counsel for the respondent (petitioner) were about to argue that the voluntarily winding up was irregular, and that the wishes of the shareholders were not properly ascertained, upon which JAMES, L.J. remarked, "As no poll was demanded the ruling of the chairman is by sect. 51 [Companies Act, 1862] made conclusive. You cannot go into that now." This apparently was the decision of the whole Court. The Court discharged the order of Malins, V.-C. and recognised that the voluntary winding up could not be impeached. This decision was not brought to the notice of KEKEWICH, J., and under the circumstances I think myself at liberty to disregard his decision, and to follow my own view. The result is that I must treat the winding up as valid and not capable of being impeached. . . . It is perhaps right that I should observe that V. Williams, J. in Bidwell Bros., In re, and Chitty J. and the C. A. in Ernest v. Loma Gold Mines Co., considered whether a chairman had proceeded upon correct principles, but the point was not taken that a chairman's declaration is ma te conclusive, and the attention of the Court was not called to the authorities. I cannot regard either of these cases as decisions adverse to the view which I have expressed. . . . The decision of the C. A. in Gold Co., In re (post, col. 564), is itself a strong illustration of the doctrine that the Court will not, under ordinary circumstances, make a winding-up order after a voluntary winding up at the instance of shareholders.—p. 634.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—It was argued that Horbury Bridge Coal, & Co., In re, was an authority to show that, although in sect. 51 [Companies Act, 1862] the word used is "conclusive," that word is not to be read as conclusive, but as prima facie conclusive. I do not agree with the argument; and I think that when Horbury Bridge, & Co., In re, is looked at it decides nothing of the sort. I thought at first that the interlocutory observations of Sir G. Jessel in that case had reference to the words of sect. 51; but Stirling, L.J., called my attention to the fact that that was not so, and that Sir G. Jessel was referring really to the thirty-seventh article of association of that particular company, the material words of which, as set out in the report of that case, were, "a declaration by the chairman that a resolution has been carried, and an entry to that effect in the book of proceedings of the company, shall be sufficient evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against such resolution"; and it is in reference to those words that Sir G. Jessel says: "Sufficient evidence in the absence of evidence to the contrary, but not conclusive evidence."—p. 307.

LOPES, L.J.—The mode in which the power conferred by sect. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act of 1870 on a majority of creditors to bind a minority is to be exercised has, to my mind, been very well and correctly laid down in the Alabama, &c. Ry. Co.'s Case, already referred to. What I understand to be decided by that case is this, that it is not sufficient for the Court to ascertain that the statutory conditions have been complied with, the Court must also be satisfied that the statutable authority have acted bona fide, not adversely to those whom they professed to represent, and that the arrangement contemplated is a reasonable one, such as a man of business would reasonably approve—reasonably with regard to the particular circumstances of the case.—p. 414.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—I allowed this matter to stand over in order that I might read the judgment of the C. A. in English, &c. Chartered Bank, In re, because, the scheme of arrangement in that case being very like the scheme submitted to me for sanction in this case, and the circumstances generally of the two banks not being dissimilar, I thought that it would greatly assist me. . . . It seems to me, then, that the discharge being clearly by operation of law consequent upon pending statutory liquidation, the principles laid down by Mellish, L.J., in Jacobs, In re, apply, and that, therefore, there is no need, and it would not be right, to introduce a reservation of rights against sureties into the scheme of arrangement. It seems to me, also, that it is unnecessary, at all events in a case where the arrangement is arrived at pending a winding up by the Court or under supervision, as distinguished from a mere voluntary winding up. . . . As to making provision that the old shareholders shall not escape liability by a transfer of the new shares while not fully paid, I have the assistance of the judgment in English, & Co. v. Chartered Bank, In re. . . I do not think that I can do anything which amounts to a modification of the scheme without submitting it again to the creditors; but I gather that the C. A. does not think that the introduction of a term preserving the liability of the shareholders (the memorandum seems preferable to the articles, since the former cannot be altered) would be a modification of the scheme, although such a matter has been expressly dealt with in some schemes; and the introduction of such a provision into the memorandum might affect the practical working of the scheme, because the old shareholders might be deterred by such a provision from electing to take shares in the new bank.—p. 547.

STIRLING, J.—The M.R. there [Baring-Gould and Sherrington, & Co. v. Syndicate, In re (supra, col. 394)] appears to be of opinion, as I read his judgment, that it is impossible by articles of association to deprive dissentient members of the benefits conferred on them by sect. 161. Then as to . . . Cotton v. Imperial, & Co. Corporation, the sale there purported to be made was not a sale in a winding up, and that was the ground of the decision. It was a sale by a company as a going concern under the power conferred on it by the memorandum of association; and as the L.J. pointed out, the validity of that sale could not be impeached by the liquidator, but the question would be when he received the shares which were the consideration for the contract of sale what he was to do with them. That does not apply to the present case, because this is on the face of it a sale in a winding up.—p. 160.

LINDLEY, M.R.—When "amalgamating" a company with another company or persons or firms is spoken of, I confess that I am not prepared to put any sharp definition upon it. I have no doubt that it includes the case put by Lord Hatherley in Higgs' Case, and more recently by Lord Davey in New Zealand, & Co. v. Peacock. I do not think it necessarily involves the formation of a new company to carry on the business of an old company. I have no doubt it includes that, but I do not think it is confined to that, and I do not think it is understood to be confined to that. I do not see how a company as a business transaction can practically amalgamate with persons or companies carrying on business unless the company does in some way or other sell its assets as a whole. . . . The distribution [of shares, the consideration for the sale], certainly does not taint the consideration with illegality. I think upon the authority of Griffith v. Paget, which Stirling, J. acted upon, he was quite justified in saying that it did not affect the validity of the agreement. . . . The only new one is this point about the closure. . . . I am aware of the extremely important distinction drawn by Lord Kilon in Const v. Harris (supra, col. 419). . . . I think that principle is as important, and perhaps more important, now than it was sixty or seventy years ago. But that does not mean that a minority who are bent on obstructing business, and resolved on talking for ever, should not be put down. It means that the majority are not to be tyrannical. After hearing what is to be said, they may say, "We have heard enough." They may say, "We are not bound to listen until everybody is tired of talking and has sat down."—p. 600.

LINDLEY, M.R.—So far as the authorities go, it appears to me that this scheme is in principle sanctioned by the decision in Postlethwaite v. Port Philip Mining Co. and Weston v. New Gaston Co., though I think this case goes a step further than either of those, or any other which I know of. I have not found any case that goes quite so far, and that made me pause before expressing an opinion upon this; but having looked at the scheme, it appears to me that there is nothing ultra vires about it, and if that is so this injunction cannot be sustained. I do not doubt that this injunction has been moved for and encouraged by the query in Buckley's Companies Acts (7th edition), p. 428. It is a doubt not raised by him, but by my predecessor, Lord Esher, in . . . Nicholl v. Eberhardt Mining Co. The passage in Mr. Buckley's book is this: "Whether an agreement would be valid by which shares not applied for by the shareholders are to be at the disposal of the new company, quære." . . . I answer the query by saying that I dissent from the observations of my predecessor. He was not considering a case like this, but a different case, and I cannot help thinking that he was addressing himself to the question whether he would himself approve the scheme or not; and if in the present case I were addressing my mind to the same question, I might suggest some modification.—p. 697.

TURNER, L.J.—The case seems to have been considered by the V.-C. as falling, to some extent, within Dobson's Case; but I do not think that Dobson's Case has any application to the present case. In Dobson's Case there was a complete contract by Mr. Dobson; he not only signed the agreement to take the shares, but he paid the money for the shares; and the sole question in Dobson's Case was, whether he, having signed the agreement as executor, and paid the money as executor, and taken a receipt for it as executor, was entitled, as between himself and the other members of the company, to say it was the estate, and not himself personally, that was liable for the shares. We held that he could not be entitled to have the shares in the character of executor so as to make the estate liable as between him and his partners; but that he could not, as between him and his partners in the concern, stipulate that the estate, and not he individually, should be liable. That was the principle upon which Dobson's Case proceeded.—p. 144. CAIRNS, L.J. concurred.

WRIGHT, J.—In Coventry's Case there were no applications at all for shares, but sham allotments made by the directors to shareholders, and under those circumstances the Court held that the directors could not be fixed with liability as shareholders, though they might be otherwise liable.—p. 338.

The ground on which they proceeded was, that this case was concluded by Wolverhampton, &c. Co. v. Hawkesford, and they indicated very considerable doubt of the propriety of that decision. In that doubt we do not concur, as it does not seem to us that the decision was such as supposed by the Court below. What was decided in that case was, that there was no sealed register at the time of the first call, and unless there was, that the defendant was not then a shareholder liable to calls. The remark that the defendant was not the owner of specific shares, is only in furtherance and illustration of the remark that there was no sealed register. We think that case was rightly decided, but that it was no authority, as supposed, for the decision in the Court below. And some of us concur in that part of the doubt there indicated, namely, whether the want of numbering the shares in the register would of itself be a bar to this action.—p. 366.

JAMES, L.J.—Thereupon it appears to me he has done everything, and the company has done everything which was necessary to make him a complete shareholder, subject only, of course, to the question which was decided at law in *East Gloucestershire Ry. v. Probably the question would have been, and may still be, an arguable one at law, but we convoke ourselves for all purposes entirely bound by the decision which has been come to by the Court of law upon that subject.—p. 473.

THESIGER, L.J. (for self, BRAMWELL and BAGGALLAX, L.JJ.).—We cannot agree with the argument of Mr. Benjamin that the ratio decidendi was limited to the narrow ground of an estoppel founded upon the special circumstances of the case, although the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., and the concluding passages of the judgment of the M.R., lend some colour to the argument; but we read the judgment as deciding that where, by an Act of Parliament, persons' names are incorporated into a company having a share capital, and the same persons are also named as directors, while the holding of a certain number of shares is prescribed as a qualification for the office of directors, these legal consequences follow: First, each incorporator, ex necessitate rei, becomes a member of the company, and as such, and apart from the definition of shareholder given in sect. 3 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, must be considered as holding at least one share in the company; and each person named as a director must be considered as holding the number of shares constituting the prescribed qualification: Secondly, sect. 36 of the last-mentioned Act, under which the acere facias in this and similar cases is issued, authorises its issue against any shareholder. Section 8 of the same Act defines "shareholder" as meaning "shareholder, proprietor, or member of the company," and consequently execution may issue against a person who by the special Act is constituted a director, a member of the company, and therefore a shareholder. The decision in Portal v. Emmens, though going to the length we have mentioned appears to us to go no farther, and the facts there proved showed that the defendant on the one hand had done nothing for the purpose of getting rid of his position as director, with its consequent obligations, and on the other hand had done nothing towards satisfying the liability of the plaintiff, under which the company by its special Act itself had come. It is a long step from such a case to the present, where years after directors have resigned their offices, and other persons de facto acted in their stead, without any claim being made by the company to treat the original directors as shareholders, a creditor of the company whose claim against it only first arose long after their resignations, attempts to treat those original directors as still shareholders; and we are of opinion that such a claim cannot under the circumstances of this case be supported.—p. 356.

TURNER, L.J.—The case differed essentially from Elkington's Case, for in the latter case there was a formal letter of allotment of the shares, and receipt of the certificates of the shares.—p. 615. CAIRNS, L.J.—In that case [Elkington's Case] there appeared to the Court to have been two agreements, one an unqualified agreement to take the shares, the other a collateral agreement to pay calls by supplying goods. In the present case . . . as for Mr. Hodges' letter of July 14, that letter being from Mr. Hodges in his individual capacity, did not bind the company to allot shares to Mr. Pellatt. Nor, the company not being bound or having agreed to allot shares, did Mr. Pellatt's formal application of July 20, and the registration of him as holder of the shares, make a completed contract between him and them, in default of a reply by the company to his application, and a communication to him of the fact of the allotment of the shares to him. LINDLEY, L.J.—Speaking generally, an underwriter of shares agrees to take so many, not exceeding a certain number, as a company may require, in order to make up the total number, without which business cannot be commenced; and until the company knows how many it wants from the underwriter, I do not see how it can be in a position to accept his offer. Upon this point I concur with the view taken by Kay, J., in Hindley's Case. In Bultfontein Sun Diamond Mines, In re, the terms were such that notice of acceptance was inferred from the retention of the letter by the person to whom it was addressed, without more. But no such inference can be fairly drawn in this case, as the number of shares for which the letter was accepted had to be communicated to the underwriter. . . . So far I agree with the view taken by North, J. He, however, decided that Stark was estopped from denying Akerman's authority to apply for shares in his name: and the learned judge came to this conclusion on the authority of the decision of this Court in Harrison, Ex parte, which, however, was a very different case from the present. The facts in Harrison, Ex parte, may be shortly stated as follows: Harrison (who carried on business under the name of Pearson & Co.) had signed an underwriting letter which had been accepted by the person to whom it was addressed—that is, Lakeman. By that letter Harrison agreed to subscribe or find subscribers for 300 shares (neither more nor less) in a brewery company, and to apply for them on a particular day: and, in the event of his not applying for them on that day he empowered Lakeman to apply for them in his name. So far as appeared by that letter, there was no condition whatever for the exercise of this power, except—first, the non-application by Harrison for 300 shares on the day named: and secondly, the acceptance by Lakeman of the offer made by the letter to him. Harrison had not applied for the shares, and the acceptance of the offer appeared from Lakeman's signed acceptance on the document itself. In another document (of which the company had no knowledge or notice) Harrison had stipulated that the acceptance of his offer by Lakeman should be communicated to him by a particular day. This was not done, nor was Harrison ever in fact informed before shares were allotted to him that Lakeman had accepted his offer. The Court held that Harrison was estopped from denying that Lakeman had authority to apply for 300 shares in his name. That case turned entirely on the private letter. The case was fought and decided with reference to that, and what was said about estoppel was addressed to the controversy there raised. Whether what was said about estoppel would have been applicable if there had been no private letter it is unnecessary to consider. The point can be reconsidered when it arises, and Duff's Diamond Mines, In re, can be considered with it.—p. 300.

GIFFARD, L.J.—This case is plain and simple, and is a mere repetition of Migotti's Case, which proceeds on the ground that if a man signs the memorandum of association he is bound to take shares from the company, and does not satisfy that obligation by taking them from someone else. It was said in the Court below that Drummond's Case and Pell's Case are not reconcilable with Evans's Case, but this is not so. Drummond's Case arose under an agreement for amalgamation, under which shareholders in each company were to take shares in the new company in lieu of their shares in the old. Drummond, who engaged to take shares in the new company, and pay for them, fulfilled his obligation by taking them and giving up his old shares. There was a direct dealing between Drummond and the new company, and the new company received a benefit from him, which satisfied his obligation to them. So in Pell's Case, there was a direct agreement between Pell and the company, by which his agreement to take and pay for shares was satisfied, the company receiving property from him instead of money.—p. 273.

ROMILLY, M.R.—I cannot help feeling regret at the definition of Melish, L.J. on the subject as to whether it would be a good plea of payment at law to satisfy the statute. I regret that we should have to discuss what would answer the terms of a good plea of payment at law, because according to the former decisions of this Court there must be what we consider a good payment in equity, and there has been no payment in cash in equity. According to Mellish, L.J., also, this statute has not made the case any different to what it was before. His remarks in giving judgment in Fothergill's Case, judging from the report which I am referring to [21 W. R. 301], leave it where it was before.—p. 360.

JESSEL, M.R.—A suggestion was made which was not one of the grounds of the V.-C.'s judgment, that you cannot have a contract under this section with a director or promoter, and observations were made with reference to dicta of the late learned Mellish, L.J. in Crickmer's Case, where he said that the contract must be with some person external to the company. As I understand him, what he meant was this. The case before him referred to the mere registration of the articles of association, that is, the articles constituting the company, and it was decided that it was not a sufficient contract. What he meant by "external" was not being a part of the original constitution of the company, but a contract made by the company as a corporation and somebody else. But that somebody else might be a director or promoter. He did not say he must be a person unconnected with the company, but that the person must be external to the company, that is, a person external in the sense I have mentioned as not being one of the members of the company, merely co-operating in the formation of the company. That appears to me to be the only fair interpretation that can be put upon his words, which is in my opinion consonant with the law of the case.—p. 104.

MELLISH, L.J.—Now the argument has been based upon Daniell's Case. It is said, "There are two steps in the breach of trust you have committed—the one the allotting of the shares, which makes you a shareholder and a member; and, secondly, the paying them up; and that they are entitled to adopt so much of the transaction as relates to allotting the shares and making you a shareholder, while we repudiate that portion of the transaction which represents the shares as being paid up." Daniell's Case is relied on as an authority for this view. Now, in my opinion, there is a material distinction between Daniell's Case and the present case. In Daniell's Case there was no contract between any third person and the company, entitling that third person to paid-up shares at all. The only contracts which took place were between the directors and the particular director to whom the shares were allotted. It was a case in fact, where the directors made presents of the shares of the company to each other; and in that state of things it was held, and it is not necessary to say whether it was held correctly or not, that quoad the allotment the thing may be ratified. Turner, L.J. said that was a breach of trust, too, although I confess I should have rather thought the more correct way of putting it would be that quoad the allotment of shares to the directors, it was perfectly valid, but quoad entering them as paid up, it was a breach of trust, and therefore that which was a breach of trust could be done away with, whereas that which was not a breach of trust must remain.—p. 9.

FRY, L.J.—The effect of the decisions of this Court in Fothergill's Case (supra, col. 492), Spargo's Case, and White's Case (supra) has been to strike out of the statute [Companies Act, 1867, s. 25] for the purpose of every Court bound by those decisions those words "in cash"; and as this Court is so bound, we are not at liberty to have recourse to these words.—p. 268.

LOPES, L.J.—The authorities have clearly determined . . . that by a payment in cash, according to the words used in this section, is meant any such transaction as would in an action at law for calls on the shares support a plea of payment. . . . It appears to me it [the transaction in the present case] was an agreement between Mr. Kent and the directors that a certain debt due to him from the company, but not payable in present, should be applied to his liability, not then existing, but which might arise at some future time. Now, is this a payment, or, in other words, would it support a plea of payment in cash for calls? It is to be observed no entry was made in the books, and there is no writing off of the amount. I am clearly of opinion it would not. It has been said that this case is like Ferrao's Case, and Mr. Kent relies on Ferrao's Case. I cannot see that Ferrao's Case assists him. On the contrary, I think it is against him; because if that case is looked at it would appear that the principle of it was this. It was not held in that case that the contract or the judge's order was a sufficient payment, but it was held that the actual writing off the amount in the books of the company was equivalent to payment.—p. 271.

NORTH, J.—I need not refer in detail to Kent's Case, because there the Court held that there was not a present agreement, but merely a contract as to something which was to be done in futuro. There being nothing immediately due either from the company in respect of their debt, or from the shareholder in respect of calls upon the shares, there was nothing as to which there could be a payment in cash. In my opinion, there was in the case now before me a present agreement that a sum immediately payable by the company to T. F. Hampton should be applied in paying up in full the shares of the respondents, and that, in my opinion, is equivalent to payment of the shares in cash.—p. 585.

OOTTON, L.J.—It is true that James, L.J. in Blyth's Case, did say that as between the company and the allottee (from whom Blyth purchased) the shares were at the time fully paid up shares within the meaning of the articles; but, as the contract was not registered, Blyth was liable as the holder of unpaid shares. I am not certain that he did not refer to the particular constitution of that company, the articles of association of which provided that "all shares allotted or issued as the consideration for the purchase of any property were to be considered as fully paid up," and the contract there was to grant and to take simply those shares. It may be said here that the contract was for particular shares, and that it provided, though ineffectually, that they should be shares fully paid up. In Blyth's Case the contracting party who contemplated taking the shares had taken them, and allowed them to be put in his name upon the register; and when upon the register with his knowledge, he had dealt with them by transferring them to Mr. Blyth, who was placed on the list of contributors, and who contended that he was under no liability in respect of the shares. In my opinion that has no bearing upon what has to be decided in the present case. I only refer to it because reference has been made to the observation of James, L.J., the effect of which I have stated.—p. 198.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I cannot agree with Dure Hail Rolling Mills Co., In re (post, col. 513), and Plunkington Tube Co., In re (post, col. 513), where it was held that shares in limited companies could be issued at a discount. . . . The principle on which Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank (post, col. 509), was decided by the H. L. was, that a shareholder contracts to contribute a certain amount to be applied in payment of the debts and liabilities of the company, and that it is inconsistent with his position as a shareholder, while he remains such, to claim back any of that money: he must not, directly or indirectly, receive back any part of it; and this appears to me to govern the present case. I think that the cases before Hall, V.-C.—Mudford's Claim and Appleyard, Ex parte—cannot be relied on. In each of those cases there were old debts in payment of which the shares had been given, and this might support the decisions that there was a right to prove; but, in my opinion, the orders were wrong in form. Liberty might perhaps have been given to prove for the old debts, but liberty could not, I think, be properly given to prove for the calls.—p. 254.

LOPES, L.J.—I will assume that the contract here was to issue fully paid-up shares, though I doubt it. Then Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank decides that a shareholder cannot claim damages against the company of which he is a member for misrepresentations by which he was induced to take his shares. The proper remedy is rescission of the contract. Here rescission has become impossible, and the shareholder has no remedy at all against the company. It is urged that this case may be distinguished from Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, because there damages were claimed for misrepresentations, here for breach of contract; but that does not appear to me to be a substantial distinction.

Our decisions may be inconsistent with Mudford's Claim and Appleyard, Ex parte, but I do not think these cases are to be relied on.—ib.

LORD HOBHOUSE (for self, HALSBURY, L.C., LORDS HERSHELL, WATSON, MACAGHTEN, MORRIS and DAVEY and SIR R. COUCH).—Their lordships have been furnished with a copy of the agreement in Hartley's Case. It was made between a Mr. Boden of the one part, and a Mr. Field of the other part. Field is described as the agent of a company then being formed, and of the promoters thereof. Boden agrees to sell and Field to purchase certain property at the price of £6,000, to be paid as to £800, by an equivalent amount of fully paid-up shares in the intended company, and as to £1,200, in cash after the registration of the company. If the company should fail within thirty days of registration to adopt the agreement the vendor was to be at liberty to annul the sale. After the formation of the company, but before the registration of the agreement under the Act of 1867, 200 of the vendor's paid-up shares were issued to his assignee or nominee Hartley. After the issue, registration of the agreement, which had been previously overlooked, was effected. Then the 200 issued shares were cancelled, and 240 new ones allotted to Hartley. Those proceedings gave rise to two questions: first, the official liquidator put Hartley on the list in respect of the 200 cancelled shares; and the question was whether the cancellation was valid. The Court held that it was; pointing out that 200 paid-up shares were part of the purchase-money, and that if they were not granted the vendor would to that extent be still unpaid. Owing to inadvertence, the 200 shares first issued were liable to calls, and in rectifying that mistake the company were only doing without suit what the Court would have ordered them to do. Their lordships notice these facts because in the report of the case in L. R. 18 Eq. 542, and L. R. 10 Ch. 157 the statement of the case is confined to the cancelled shares, and except for one passage in Lord Cairns's judgment, there is nothing to show that the sufficiency of the agreement was in controversy. But from other reports (44 L. J. Ch. 240; 32 L. T. 106; and 23 W. R. 203), it is clear that the official liquidator put Hartley on the list in respect of the 240 new shares as well as the 200 cancelled ones, and that the sufficiency of the agreement came into question with respect to those shares, and was upheld in both Courts, and that Mellish, L.J. expressed his concurrence with Lord Cairns. . . . The only document purporting to be an agreement which has been registered in the present case, and the only document therefore which it is necessary to consider, is that of July 30th, 1888. The Courts below regard it as a contract sufficient to comply with the exigencies of sect. 57 of the Companies Act of 1874 [New South Wales]. In the opinion of their lordships that document is not a contract in any proper sense of the word. It is nothing more than a resolution by certain persons interested in a mining property setting forth the manner in which they proposed to put the property before the public. It does not create, nor was it intended to create any legal rights, duties, or obligations as between the persons expressed to be parties to it. It was a contract in form only. The persons interested in the property and the shareholders in the company to be registered were just the same persons over again in a different guise; they had, as stated above, already distributed the whole of the share capital among themselves. In Hartley's Case there was a genuine sale, and a genuine purchase, and a genuine bargain to pay the price by paid-up shares issued to the vendor, who could enforce the bargain under peril of annulling the sale.—p. 98.

BYRNES, J.—In the case that I have before me the company is bound to issue shares, if at all, as fully paid up—that is to say, the contract if acted upon binds the company to issue fully paid-up shares, and does not confer a power upon or reserve a power to the company to pay otherwise than by means of fully paid-up shares. On the other hand I have been referred to Coolgarvie, &c. Mines, In re, before Wright, J. There the contract provided that the directors of the purchasing company might discharge it either wholly in cash or partly in cash and partly in fully paid-up shares, so that it appears that there was no final determination that the shares to be given as the purchase price were to be otherwise than in cash. So also in Jackson & Co., In re, the determination was left to the directors whether they should pay wholly or partly in cash, shares, or debentures.—p. 672.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—That case [Karakshoma, &c. Syndicate, In re] turned upon an agreement which did not, in my opinion show any consideration at all, because it merely referred to an earlier agreement in this way—"for the considerations therein mentioned." It has been said that to constitute a contract in writing within sect. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the consideration must be shown. I agree, but in the cited case the contract did not show any consideration at all. . . . The judgments in the decided cases appear to me to go this length—that the particularity in the statement of the consideration need only show the nature and not the details of the consideration. I wish to point out that where on the face of the agreement which is filed the nature of the consideration is stated, that is all that sect. 25 requires. I therefore agree with the decision of Romer, J. in this case, and not with that of Kekewich, J. in Maynards, Ltd., In re, a case in which the point now raised was not fully argued.—p. 547.

KEKEWICH, J. (after discussing Karakshoma, &c. Syndicate, In re, and Frost & Co., Ltd., In re) concluded: "Now, the purchaser here does not see the 'nature of the consideration;' it is only stated to be the sale and purchase of property. It may be copyhold, freehold, or leasehold, or anything that fairly comes within the meaning of property. I do not understand the L.J. to say in Frost & Co., Ltd., In re, that there need be no statement of the nature of the consideration; and, as I have pointed out, it is distinctly stated by V. Williams, L.J., and concurred in by the other L.J.J., that the reference to another contract will not suffice. To my mind, this case does not come within the decision of the C. A. in Frost & Co., Ltd., In re, and a sufficient contract has not been filed.—p. 662.

SIR F. JEUNE.—It seems to be perfectly clear that the object of that section [sect. 25] is that it should be shown and made public what shares are not to be taken as liable to be paid for in full in cash. That has to be shown by a contract, and a contract determining it otherwise—determining, that is to say, that something else is to be given or has been given for them. It is necessary, inasmuch as it is provided that there should be a contract, that it should be shown what the consideration is; that is substantially what was held in Karakshoma, &c. Syndicate, In re; it is not necessary that it should be shown in detail, because, although some part of the argument addressed to us appears to be based on this ground, it is not the object of that section to determine whether the company made a good bargain or not.—p. 726. See now Companies Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 26).

MALINS, V.-C.—But Hallows v. Fernie is mainly relied upon. I should be bound by that case if the circumstances were similar. But in that case Mr. Hallows applied for shares in a company with certain gentlemen named as directors; and payment was made by him on application and allotment. Some of the directors retired. Now when a company is once constituted every man knows that there is a liability to change in the body of the directors; you cannot make men perpetual directors; and if, in this case, Mr. Gibson and Mr. Ross had remained directors after the allotment of the shares, then those who applied for shares must have taken them subject to the chance of the directors changing, as they may change, by death or resignation, and cannot complain if those on whom they relied do not remain in the company. They must take the chance of that. In Hallows v. Fernie the allotment was made in May, and the shareholder did not apply to be released until the month of September following—in fact he did not file his bill until April in the next year, a period of eleven months. Lord Chelmsford, L.C. puts it entirely on the ground that the shareholder had received the allotment and retained the shares.—p. 377.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Henderson v. Royal British Bank... seems to me, unless the law has been altered by the Companies Act, 1862, to be an authority of great weight against the appellant. Lord Campbell, in describing the attempt of a shareholder to relieve himself from liability under similar circumstances to those in which the appellant is placed, expressed his opinion in the strongest language. He said: "It would be monstrous to say, he having become a partner and a shareholder, and having held himself out to the world as such, and having so remained until the concern stopped payment, could, by repudiating the shares on the ground that he had been defrauded, make himself no longer a shareholder, and thus get rid of his liability to the creditors of the bank, who had given credit to it on the faith that he was a shareholder." The decision in this case was considered so satisfactory that it was followed by the Court of C. P. in Dossett v. Harding, and by the Court of Ex. in Danwell v. Royal British Bank without anything more being said in either Court than an expression of acquiescence in the judgment. Henderson v. Royal British Bank being supported by such a weight of authority, will materially influence my opinion upon the present case, unless I can be satisfied that the Companies Act, 1862, has placed creditors and shareholders in a different relation to each other than that in which they previously stood.—p. 962

HATHERLEY, L.C.—I think, my lords, that the principles upon which your lordships decided the Overend and Gurney Case have really no bearing whatever upon the present question. Mr. Oakes had undoubtedly become a member of the company; he knew all the objects for which it was founded, and the terms of its constitution, and he entered into the ordinary engagements. Then he said: True it is I have entered into those engagements; but I seek to be relieved from them because I was induced to enter into them by misrepresentations, without which I should not have become a shareholder. But this House held that whatever rights he might have acquired against those who made the fraudulent representations, he had, as regarded the outer world, executed an instrument by which every creditor had a right to believe that he was bound, and that he could not extricate himself after the winding-up, although before the winding-up he might have instituted proceedings to liberate himself from the engagements into which he had been led by those misrepresentations. But here the only engagement Mr. Waterhouse entered into was to pay up the 5l. per share upon all the shares which he had taken. His case rests upon two grounds: first, that the deed itself so stated; and secondly, that his acquisition of the shares was in direct conformity with the representations of the deed, and that the shares were handed over to him accordingly. Although it is true (as some of the learned judges observed) that there is nothing in the Act of Parliament which renders it a part of the duty of the directors to state in the memorandum of association what amount has been paid up, I do not conceive that that by itself can vary the position of this gentleman when he stands upon the contract he has entered into, and says: "You cannot make a new contract for me."—p. 33. CAIRNS, L.C.—I ought to observe that in Lumsden v. Buchanan the words in the deed and the register were "trustees for Mrs. E. B." not "as trustees." In a case, however, in the same bank, which occurred immediately afterwards, Lumsden v. Peddie (Court Sess. Cas. 3rd series, vol. v. p. 34), Peddie was curator bonis to Mrs. Broomfield, and he accepted stock in these words: "I, the said D. S. Peddie, as curator bonis foresaid, do hereby agree to take and accept the said capital stock, and as such bind and oblige myself, &c." The Lord Ordinary, in that case, and afterwards the Court of Session, held that the case was governed by Lumsden v. Buchanan, and that the introduction of the word "as" made no difference. From this decision there was no appeal. The Lord Justice Clerk, in giving judgment in that case observed, "It is now well settled that in this or any the like company no one can become a partner with a limited liability, or with any other liabilities than such as are borne in common by all the partners." My lords, this decision must be taken along with that of Lumsden v. Buchanan, and shows what was then understood in Scotland to be established as the law in such cases.—p. 362. LORD SELBORNE.—I should like to make one observation, and one only, upon . . . Lumsden v. Buchanan, so far as regards Dr. Andrew Buchanan. It is not at all necessary to consider to what extent and for what purposes that ought to be regarded as an authority which this House would hold to be binding on itself, in a case similar in its circumstances; but it may be useful to guard against the citation of that case as an authority for purposes to which it is certainly inapplicable, and I therefore think it worth while to take notice of what I suppose to have been the ground of that decision. The House, I suppose, considered that every entry upon a register ought to have reference to some title; that the antecedent title there was shown to be that of the other trustees, not including either by name, or by reference, or by any collective form of designation, Dr. Andrew Buchanan; and probably the House may have thought that there might have been too much confusion and uncertainty and misconception as to the effect of the form of registration adopted, to make it safe to attribute it to any other title than that which was actually produced, a title not extending to Dr. Andrew Buchanan. That I have always supposed to be the ground of the decision—the House did not think there was any transfer intended; and it could not possibly have thought, on the facts before it, that the deed of accession, by which the other trustees agreed to take the shares from the company, was subscribed by or on behalf of Dr. Andrew Buchanan. Under these circumstances the House seems to have disregarded the registry, although it was perfectly well known to Dr. Andrew Buchanan and acted upon by him, because they could not connect it with the antecedent title.—p. 612.

LORD SELBORNE.—The real doctrine which Lord Cranworth in Addie's Case meant (as I understand him) to affirm was one of substance and not of form: "An attentive consideration" (he said) "of the cases has convinced me that the true principle is that these corporate bodies, through whose agents so large a portion of the business of the country is now carried on, may be made responsible for the frauds of those agents to the extent to which the companies have profited by those frauds; but that they cannot be sued as wrongdoers by imputing to them the misconduct of those whom they have employed. A person defrauded by directors, if the subsequent acts and dealings of the parties have been such as to leave him no remedy but an action for the fraud, must seek his remedy against the directors personally." The words in this passage "to the extent to which the companies have profited by those frauds," may perhaps require some enlargement or explanation; but, subject to that qualification, I am of opinion that this doctrine is in principle right, and that the present case is one in which (as in the case of Addie) there would be a miscarriage of justice, if the distinction which it involves were not attended to. . . . I do not understand that there was really any difference between Lord Chelmsford and Lord Cranworth in that case [Addie's]; both appear to me to have founded their judgments upon those views of the law of agency on the one hand, and of fraud on the other, to which I have already referred. One expression, indeed, of Lord Cranworth, in that part of his judgment which relates to the question of damages ("He comes too late"), might possibly, if it were not qualified by the subsequent context, have been taken to mean that even if the unregistered company had been liable to be sued for damages, by its public officer, down to the time of registration, that liability would not have been among the "debts and obligations" transferred by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49, s. 8, to the registered company. Lord Cranworth was, I think, too good a lawyer and too accurate a thinker to have placed any such narrow (I had almost said unreasonable) construction upon such words in such a statute. He made to my mind, his real meaning plain by what he went on to say: from which it is apparent that if the Western Bank had been incorporated before, and not after, the frauds then in question, the corporation would not, in his opinion, have been liable for those frauds in an action of this kind for damages and that, my lords, is precisely the present case.—p. 328.

LINDLEY, M.R.—We have to consider what effect the new practice introduced by the Judicature Acts has upon the rules which have been laid down over and over again upon this question of taking proceedings to get a name removed from the register of members of a company when winding-up proceedings are imminent. Unquestionably the old practice was settled, and the old rule was laid down by the Court in Scottish Petroleum Co. In re [Wallace's Case], the decision in which nobody quarrels with. . . . A man could not get the right to rescind by simply defending an action for calls. That may account for the decision of Rolt, L.J., in Stevenson, Ex parte. . . . Whether Stevenson, Ex parte, were a little too far or not it is quite unnecessary to consider. One can easily, by working it out, see that it might lead to very extraordinary results; because, supposing that in an action for calls the defendant pleaded that he had been induced to take his shares by fraud, and that question were tried out and he won, it would be very difficult to see how he could be made a contributory after that. No doubt the decision may be explained, but I say nothing more about it. We are asked to extend what Rolt, L.J. did under the old practice to a case which has arisen under the new practice, which has entirely altered the procedure. In effect, what the appellant has done has been sufficient to take the legal steps before the commencement of the winding up to have his name taken off the register and the shares taken out of his name.—p. 252. LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an application by Mr. Karberg to be struck off the list of contributors . . . and to recover the money he paid for his shares on their allotment to him. His ground is that he was induced to take shares in the company by a misrepresentation in the company's prospectus. He says it was the same as that which in Wainwright's Case this Court decided to be a misrepresentation, entitling Wainwright to have his name removed from this list. Wainwright, however, applied for his shares after the company was registered and on the faith of a prospectus issued by the company after its formation. Karberg, on the other hand, applied for his shares before the company was formed and on the faith of a prospectus issued by the promoters. In Wainwright's Case the prospectus in effect stated that Lord Brabourne and Admiral Mayne were members of the council of association, which was not true, and the company knew before they allotted shares to Wainwright that Lord Brabourne had refused to be on the council. In Karberg's Case the prospectus stated in effect that Lord Brabourne and Admiral Mayne would be members of the council, which is a different thing. Moreover, the company accepted Karberg's application for shares before the company knew that either Lord Brabourne or Admiral Mayne had refused to be on the council. The two cases, therefore, are dissimilar in many material respects.—p. 744.

This seems to me to be the essence of the decision in Karberg's Case.—p. 97.

BUCKLEY, J.—In Karberg's Case the acceptance of the application for shares by the allotment of the shares was the acceptance of an offer made on the terms of the prospectus, although that prospectus was issued by the promoters. In the present case no allotment to Lord Lurgan was necessary. His signature to the memorandum of association made him on registration a member of the company, and bound him, not only in favour of the company, but in favour of every other person who became a member of the company.—p. 325.

WRIGHT, J.—As regards Foulkes v. Quartz Hill, &c. Co., it is unfortunate that the decision of the C. A. in that case was not fully reported, as it is a very important one; but I doubt whether the Court intended to lay down the rule so absolutely as is stated in the note to the report—namely, "The C. A. reversed the above decision, holding that the issue of the writ was a definite election to rescind, and that this election was not affected by the subsequent voting at the meeting." I do not think that note goes quite so far as the note in Mr. Palmer's book, Company Precedents, 7th ed. pt. 2, p. 353.—p. 14.

COTTON, L.J.—What was that case? [Almada and Tiritio Co., In re.] In answer to an offer made by the company, a man had made an application to take certain shares at a discount, and in fact his name was put on the register; but he never assented in any way to his name being on the register, and as soon as ever he found that his name was in fact on the register he applied to this Court to be relieved from what had been done by the company under the contract, which was one that could not be enforced, and which did not give the company any right so long as the matter still remained in contract only, to put him on the register. Therefore there was wanting in that case the material point here, namely, the assent of the shareholder to her name being on the register in respect of these shares. Then Beck's Case [supra, col. 490] was referred to; but the mistake on which the applicant was there relying was not a mistake in law, but a mistake in fact. Beck had applied to have shares allotted to him on certain terms, and the directors had allotted the shares to him on different terms. The lords justices held that, although Beck did ask for a certificate of the shares after he had received the notice of allotment on those different terms, yet he could not be taken to have given his assent to the new terms, the reasonable inference being that he had asked for the certificate of the shares in order to find out the real truth.—p. 113.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Arnott's Case [supra, col. 497] . . . went on this principle—that there was waiting what you have here, namely, an assent of the shareholder to keep the shares which were put in his name. Then there is Carling's Case [supra, col. 494]. That was a directors' qualification case, in which the facts were totally different. The directors had got, and were registered in respect of paid-up shares, which had been issued in pursuance of a duly registered contract. They got them by a gross breach of trust which was very much like a fraud, and the contention of the liquidator was that they were liable to be put on the list of contributories in respect of unpaid-up shares. The Court said: "No, they have got shares which are paid up and which cannot be treated as otherwise than paid up, and your remedy against them is for breach of trust, for which there is another and a distinct mode of relief." That has nothing to do with this case or any case similar to this.—p. 116.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—The contrast drawn by Lord Herschell in Oregon Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper is not a contrast between a company which is now a going concern and a company in liquidation. The contrast which he draws is a contrast between the rights of a company and the rights of the creditors of a company. Lord Herschell is there really saying that the company has no right to enforce payment of the difference between the amount paid and the full amount of the shares, but that its creditors have such a right. That being so, and there being no right of creditors in question at all in the present case, the only rights are those of shareholders; and, if the case were to rest on Lord Herschell's judgment, on which the petitioner relied, a shareholder is no more right to come and enforce by petition this liability of the shareholders to whom shares have been issued at a discount than he had, in Lord Herschell's opinion, in that case to enforce it by an action.—p. 508.

HALSBURY, L.C.—In respect of the liability to pay up the shares so far as it is necessary to satisfy creditors and the cost of winding up, I believe no doubt exists in the minds of any of this House. Since the Oreogum Gold Mining Co.'s Case in this House, it would be impossible to contend that that question is not covered by authority. But it is said that where the only object in making a call is to settle the rights of the shareholders inter se, the law laid down in the Oreogum Case does not conclude the question. I am unable to accede to that view. . . . Whether for the purpose of settling the rights inter se, or for the purpose of satisfying creditors, it appears to me that the statute forces the company and shareholder alike to conform to the rule laid down, that a share for a fixed amount shall make the person agreeing to take that share liable for that amount. I think that is the decision in the Oreogum Case. . . . In truth, though no form reserved by the discussion in the Oreogum Case, I think the Oreogum Case does decide the question now in debate, and whether they were bonus shares upon which nothing was paid, or discount shares upon which 10s only was paid, the holders of those shares are, in my judgment, liable to make good for any company purporting the amount of the money which, upon the face of the share, they undertake to pay.—p. 364.

LORD WATSON.—The decision of the House in the Oreogum Gold Mining Co.'s Case carries that construction [of sect. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867] thus far, that no member of a limited company, who is not protected by a proper contract, duly registered in terms of the clause, can have a good defence against payment of such proportion of the nominal amount of his shares as has not been paid in cash, when payment is required by the liquidator for the purpose of meeting the claims of creditors of the company or the cost of liquidation.—p. 365.

LORD HERSCHELL also discussed the Oreogum Gold Mining Co.'s Case, and dissented from the view of the C.A. in Weymouth, &c. Steam Packet Co., In re (post, col. 572).—p. 568.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Your lordships were reminded that there was a judicial decision, for several years unversed, which sanctioned the issue of shares at a discount. That is so. But it must be remembered that at the time when that decision was pronounced the current of authority had drifted somewhat away from the true principles of the Act of 1862. As soon as those principles were re-asserted and re-established by your lordships' House in Trevor v. Whitworth [supra, col. 406], it became clear again—clear, I think, beyond argument—that the shares of a company limited by shares could not be issued at a discount. The issue of shares at a discount is just as much an unauthorised reduction of capital as the purchase by a company of its own shares. And so it was held by the C.A. in the Almida and Tivita Case [supra, col. 513], and afterwards in this House in the Oreogum Gold Mining Co.'s Case. Speaking for myself, I must say I do not think that the Oreogum Case laid down any new law. It was no new departure. The governing principle is stated as plainly and as emphatically in Dent's Case [supra, col. 493] by the L.C. (Lord Selborne), as it was by any of the noble and learned lords who took part in the Oreogum Case in 1892. Holding, as this House afterwards held in the Oreogum Gold Mining Co.'s Case, that the memorandum of association of a limited company has the effect of prescribing as well as of limiting the liability of its members, Lord Selborne points out, as has been pointed out over and over again, that, with certain exceptions not material for the present purpose, sect. 12 of the Act of 1862 forbids any alteration in the conditions contained in the memorandum. "It is," says his lordship, "quite certain that, under that clause, if there be found anything in the articles limiting the liability of the shareholders in a way inconsistent with the memorandum—anything tending to reduce the liability of the shareholders thereby prescribed—it is simply void." Nothing can be more to the point than that. So far the Oreogum Gold Mining Co.'s Case goes; but it was not, I think, meant to go further. And, indeed, several of the noble and learned lords who took part in the judgment in that case guarded themselves against being supposed to determine or prejudice the present question. It may be that the principle on which the decisions in Dent's Case and the Oreogum Case proceed leave little room for the appellant's contention. Still, if it could be shown that the appellant has any equity to be relieved from further liability—if the Court could be "satisfied of the justice of the case," to use the words of the Act of 1862—I do not think the decision in the Oreogum Case would be a fatal bar. Nor, with all deference to the view thrown out by the C.A. in Weymouth, &c. Steam Packet Co., In re, would it be a sufficient objection that the contract, if there be a contract, was one with the company and not with the shareholders. If directors, being duly authorised in that behalf, invite persons to take shares on certain terms varying the rights of members inter se, acceptance of the invitation must, I think, establish a contractual relation between the members themselves.—p. 374.

LORD DAVEY.—The question now before the House was, it is true, left open in the Oreogum Case, but the solution of it seems to me logically and necessarily to follow from what was decided in that case. . . . It is familiar law that no article can be valid or binding upon the shareholders which is in conflict with the memorandum or with the general law. Nor does it admit of doubt that shareholders equally with creditors have the right to invoke the conditions contained in the memorandum, and resist any infraction of them; and, in fact, until the winding up takes place a creditor has no right to do so. That was the principle on which both the cases of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel [supra, col. 387] were decided. Doubts have been entertained as to the correctness of the decisions in those cases, and it has been thought that the priority between existing shareholders and the holders of new share capital created under a power is one of those matters of internal management which, if not expressly settled by the memorandum, may be settled by the articles. Dissent from the decision in the second case of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. [supra, col. 387] has been expressed by one of your lordships in this House, and it has recently not been followed in the C.A.—Andrews v. Gas Meter Co. [supra, col. 389].—p. 378.

Peveril Gold Mines, In re (1897) 67 L. J. Ch. 77; [1898] 1 Ch. 122; 77 L. T. 505.—C.A. LINDLEY, M.R., CHITTY and V. WILLIAMS, L.J.J. LINDLEY, L.J.—Lord Macnaghten, in his speech in Wetton v. Saffery, says this: "These companies"—that is, companies registered with limited liability—"are the creature of statute, and by the statute to which they owe their being they must be bound in regard to shareholders as well as in regard to creditors in all matters coming within the conditions of the memorandum of association. Shareholders in these companies require protection just as much as creditors—perhaps even more; shareholders are not partners for all purposes; they have not all the rights of partners; they have practically no voice in the management of the concern. Their security in a great measure depends on the directors adhering to the requirements of the Act." . . . Section 79 [of the Act of 1862] specifies the circumstances under which a company may be dissolved by the Court, and sect. 82 states who are the persons who may apply to the Court for an order for the dissolution. Any article which is contrary to this, which says that the company was formed on the terms that its life should not be determined under the circumstances provided by the Act, or that the right of a contributory to petition for its dissolution as provided by the Act should be limited in any way, is an attempt to enforce upon the shareholders limitations which would be at variance with the provisions of the Act. . . . It is not an answer to say that such an article is only a means for enabling a contributory to waive his individual rights.—p. 80.

Navigation*] the question being one of fact—whether there had been a refusal—it was held and decided that there had been no refusal. . . . Some observations undoubtedly fell from the judges to the effect that when a demand is made the person to whom it is made should be informed bona fide of the object of that request, but I am satisfied that . . . it was not intended by the judges, and could not have been intended to import into the statute (which contains words very similar to those in the one before me [Companies Clauses Act, 1845, s. 45]) something to prevent inspection which was not to be found in the statute. The right, then, is to have access to the book, and the directors of the company are wrong in saying that the plaintiff shall have access to part only of the book when the right of access is not so limited by the statute. Then it was contended that the remedy in this case was by mandamus, and Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (1879) 49 L. J. Ch. 89; 12 Ch. D. 102; 40 L. T. 736; 28 W. R. 111.—C.A.], which deals with the subject of prerogative mandamus, was cited. This, however, is not a case in which the writ of prerogative mandamus would apply, but simply the case of a private owner of stock with a statutory right to see the books, and of an interference by the defendants with that statutory right. It seems to me to follow that when the statutory right of an individual is interfered with, an injunction would have been granted by the old Court of Chancery, and at any rate ought now to be granted by the High Court.—p. 672.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The authorities relied upon by Mr. Wright for this purpose, of which Forrest v. Manchester, &c. Ry. was the leading case, do not go the length for which he contended. Those were cases in which a nominee of a rival company not only had taken shares for the purposes of a rival company, but assumed to have a common interest with all the other shareholders, and to represent them in a suit which he instituted in his own name on behalf of himself and them. It has been held that in a suit of that kind, if a person does not really represent the interest of those whom he purports to represent, exception may be taken to him personally, and relief be denied him which would be afforded if it were true that he represented those whom he affects to represent in that form of action. This is not a case of that kind. The plaintiff does not come forward here as representing any other shareholders. This is not an action on behalf of himself and others, it is an action brought by him in his own personal interest, and does not profess to be anything else. That class of cases, therefore, does not touch this, nor am I aware of any case which warrants Mr. Wright's contention.—p. 104.

COTTON, L.J.—In Burkinshaw v. Nicolls share certificates were issued which represented the shares to be fully paid up. A person to whom some of them were issued sold the shares in the ordinary course of business to a person who bought on the faith of that representation, without anything to put them on inquiry whether it was true, and the H. L. held that as against such a purchaser the company and the liquidator were bound by the statement, on the ground that it was evidence on which as against the company the purchaser was entitled to rely that the shares had been paid up in cash. . . . Here the appellants cannot say that any representation was made either to Sauvé or themselves on which they were entitled to rely that the shares had been paid up in cash, and they are, therefore, unable to avail themselves of Burkinshaw v. Nicolls. . . . A contract by the company not to enforce payment of the calls on a share not effectually paid up would, I apprehend, be ultra vires. Waterhouse v. Jamieson (supra, col. 506) was referred to as showing that the liquidator is in no better position than the company, but the case only decided that the liquidator was bound by a statement of the company as to the amount of capital that had been paid up, a statement the falsehood of which he had no reason for suspecting, and on the faith of which statement he had taken his shares.—pp. 200—202.

FRY, L.J.—Waterhouse v. Jamieson and Burkinshaw v. Nicolls merely decided that in those cases the company as a matter of evidence was estopped from denying that the shares had been paid up in cash. In the present case there are no facts whatever from which it can be inferred that either of the appellants believed the shares

he took to have been paid up in cash, and neither of them says that he did so. They say that they believed the agreement to have been registered, but that is nothing to the purpose. They, therefore, cannot claim the benefit of estoppel.—p. 207.

WRIGHT, J.—It is argued for the applicants that the statements in the certificates that the shares are fully paid estops the liquidator from denying both the fact of payment in cash and the sufficiency of the filed contract. . . . They knew that they had not paid cash, and they cannot have supposed that the company was making them a payment of shares which some one else had paid for in cash. This excludes the application of Parbury's Case. . . . It is said that the observations of Lord Cairns in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls are an authority in favour of the applicant's contention. I do not so understand his language. When he there speaks of a representation that sect. 25 has been complied with, I understand him to mean complied with by payment in cash. Nor can I find in Bloomenthal v. Ford any suggestion that there can be any other estoppel in such a case than an estoppel against denial of payment in cash or of power to issue the shares.—p. 219.

BOWEN, L.J.—It was said that Bahia, &c. Ry., In re, shows that there was a cause of action in the nature of an implied warranty upon the certificate, or a breach of warranty arising out of the stipulation. A certificate is not like a promissory note; it does not transfer a chose in action, it is only a representation of an implied contract. Bahia, &c. Ry. was in truth an attempt, which was successful, to make the company liable in the absence of fraud upon the estoppel created by the certificate. The way in which the Court made the company liable was this: They said that if the certificate had been intended to have been acted upon, it became a document the truth of which the company could not deny as against the person to whom it was intended to be shown: and, therefore, it precluded them as against such transferees from denying the truth of what it contained. They could not be in any better position than if the statement were true; but that only obliged the company to act if the title were good. Until, therefore, the company do something which ought not to be done, or omit to do something which ought to be done, as between them and the true owner of the shares no cause of action would arise. . . . I know of no case where it has been held that a man is bound to act upon a document at the moment that it is presented to him, without being allowed time to consider it. I do not think it was intended in Cawley & Co., In re [post, col. 546], to decide that a company was not entitled to time to consider a transfer: and in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker [post, col. 586] Lord Blackburn held that they were entitled.—p. 170.

HERSCHELL, L.C. (after discussing Bahia, &c. Ry., In re, and Hart v. Frontino Gold Mining Co.) said: I have no hesitation in expressing my concurrence in the law laid down by the Court of Q. B. in Bahia, &c. Ry., In re. The reasoning of Blackburn, J. in pronouncing judgment in that case appears to me to be sound and in accordance with the law, and I think it would be very mischievous to cast any doubt on the authority of that case. The appellants argued, however, and correctly, that the present case is distinguishable from that in the Q. B. inasmuch as it is not the purchasers who are seeking to render the company liable by way of estoppel, but the vendor of the shares, who himself received the certificate from the company. Does that, in the circumstances which your lordships have to consider, make any difference? If the company must have known, as was said in the Bahia Case, that persons wanting to purchase shares might act upon the statement of fact contained in the certificate, it must equally have been within the contemplation of the company that a person receiving the certificate from them might, on the faith of it, enter into a contract to sell the shares. The plaintiff did enter into such a contract, and thereby altered his position by rendering himself liable to the persons with whom he contracted to sell the shares. All the elements necessary to create an estoppel would appear, therefore, to be present. The appellants, however, relied upon the decision in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. as showing that one who receives from a company a certificate that he is the proprietor of shares therein is not in the same position as regards his rights by estoppel against the company as a transferee from him would be. In that case Burge, who was the buyer of stock in the defendant company, received in pursuance of his purchase a transfer of the stock purporting to be executed by Coates, who was the registered owner of stock to the amount purchased. The transfer was, in fact, forged by a clerk in Coates's employ. Burge having borrowed money from a bank, the stock was transferred to Ingelow as trustee for the bank, and the company registered Ingelow as the owner, and issued a certificate accordingly. The advance having been repaid by Burge, the bank's trustee became trustee for him. The company having discovered the forgery, and refused to recognise Ingelow as the owner of the shares, an action was brought by Burge and Ingelow to compel the company to recognise their title. It was held by the C. A. that they had no title by estoppel as against the company. The grounds for the decision appear to have been twofold: in the first place, that Burge had not altered his position by reason of the statement in the certificate; in the next place, that he had himself, by producing to them a forged transfer, induced the company to insert the name of his nominee as the proprietor of the stock. Neither of these grounds applies in the case before your lordships. . . . Ashbury, Sr. Co. v. Riche [supra, col. 441], which was much pressed upon your lordships in the argument for the appellants, appears to me to have no bearing on the question at issue between the parties to this appeal. The argument was put, as I understand, in this way: The company, it was said, are only authorised to issue a limited number of shares; and to hold it liable by estoppel, as is sought to be done in this case, to a person who is not the proprietor of any of those shares, would in effect enable them to contract a liability in respect of shares beyond their authorised issue. I do not think this argument is a sound one. A person to whom the company is liable by estoppel to pay damages for refusing to register his transfer does not by reason thereof become a shareholder—p. 138.

LORD FIELD.—In Simm's Case the C. A. held, and I agree with them, that there was no duty upon the company to inquire of a registered holder whether the signature was genuine, although it was the practice of the company to do so.—p. 142.

FARWELL, J.—The proposition which is . . . referred to in Foster v. Tyne Pontoon, &c. Co., comes, I think, to this—if the broker is insolvent at the date of action brought, then it lies on the defendant to show that no money ever could have been recovered against him, and that consequently the plaintiff has not suffered by resting on his position. . . . Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. was a case of estoppel against estoppel. The transferee in that case sent a forged transfer to the office of the company and asked the company to act on it. He had at least as good means as the company of knowing whether it was a genuine transfer or not. There is nothing of that sort here. . . . In Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. there was nothing about resting on the transfer, and there was nothing to show the state of solvency or insolvency of the transferor at the time of the action brought. . . . Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson is a valuable authority for all the propositions which I have to determine, because the H. L. there held that the person who got the certificate was entitled to rely on the statement in the certificate that the person therein mentioned was the proprietor of the specified shares. The damage in that case arose from the fact that the statement in the certificate put Tomkinson in a position to sell the shares, and in reliance on that position he sold the shares, with the result that he suffered loss in consequence of the company's refusal to register the purchaser. In order to recover in an action of this sort, the plaintiff must show that he either has acted on the certificate to his detriment, or has rested on it to his detriment. Tomkinson in that case, acted upon the certificate to his detriment; in the present case the plaintiff has rested upon it to her detriment. She has remained satisfied until the time for redress from her broker is past and gone. To my mind, therefore, this case comes within the principle of Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson. Bloomenthal v. Ford is not so applicable, because there the allottee was the person relying on the estoppel. . . . Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co., also, does not seem to me to be applicable. That was a case of certification, and "certificate" and "certification" are two distinct things.—p. 505.

STIRLING, J.—Under the circumstances Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co. applies to this extent, that it is a distinct authority that dividends may be paid although the assets are not sufficient to make up the share capital. Beyond this, that case does not assist in point of decision; for there it was held, as a conclusion of fact, that the assets of the company were at the period in question of greater value than when it was first formed. I think, however, as has already been pointed out and acted upon in Verner v. General, &c. Trust that the C.A. there laid down principles which go far beyond what was required for the decision of that particular case, and, amongst others, this—that in determining whether a dividend may or may not be paid, regard is to be had to the constitution of the company and to the articles of association. . . . My attention was pointedly called to the opening sentences of the judgment delivered by Kay, L.J., in Verner v. General, &c. Trust. The observations . . . appear, however, to be mainly directed to the case of a company engaged in buying and selling, and were not treated by the L.J. himself as applicable to the case actually before him, that of a company whose business consisted in making investments. In the present case, the defendant company carries on the business of carriers; it does not buy and sell, and such loss as has occurred does not arise from the company having received a less price than it originally gave for a portion of its assets. I think that under these circumstances I ought not to apply the observations in question to the present case any more than they were applied by Kay, L.J., in Verner v. General, &c. Trust to the case then before him.—pp 519—521.

BYRNE, J.—It is clear, I think, that an appreciation in total value of capital assets, if duly realised by sale or getting in of some portion of such assets, may in a proper case be treated as available for purposes of dividend. This, I think, is involved in the decision in Lubbock v. British Bank of South America, cited with approval by Lord Lindley in Verner v. General and Commercial Investment Trust. . . . If I rightly appreciate the true effect of the decisions, the question of what is profit available for dividend depends upon the result of the whole accounts (capital as well as profit and loss) fairly taken for the year; and although dividends may be paid out of earned profits in proper cases, even where there has been a depreciation of capital, I do not think that a realised accretion to the estimated value of one item of the capital account can be deemed to be profit divisible amongst the shareholders without reference to the result of the whole accounts fairly taken.—p. 125.

How the decision in Belhaven's (Lord) Case was arrived at, it is not necessary to inquire; but undoubtedly, if Lord Belhaven was justly relieved from a deliberate contract, which he entered into, and which was perfected, there is much greater reason for relieving the appellant from the completion of a conditional contract which he was induced to enter into, and which as the condition was not performed, never became in fact or in law a binding contract.—p. 144. Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Charities (Trustees) (1855) 5 H. L. Cas. 389; 3 W. R. 573.—H.L. (TR.).

PARKE, B. (for the JUDGES).—Much reliance was placed in the course of the argument on Coles v. Bank of England as an authority for the admission of evidence of negligence not immediately connected with the particular transfer. The case furnishes no such authority. On considering the judgment of Lord Denman it seems clear that the Court adopted the argument of the counsel for the bank, that the principal question was, whether it could be made liable to replace stock transferred by a person professing to act for the proprietor, after the proprietor has recognised the transfer by receiving dividends on the reduced amount. This negligent conduct of the plaintiff in receiving dividends on the sum to which the stock was reduced by a forged transfer, was treated by the Court as evidence of the ratification of these transfers, by which the stock was reduced to that amount, and on that ground the Court seems to have proceeded.... Whether that case is altogether satisfactory, is not a matter now to be considered by us. It is enough to say that it does not apply to the case now before your lordships.—p. 411.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—Whether [in Coles v. Bank of England] I should have arrived upon the question of fact at the same conclusion is a matter upon which I do not feel myself called to speculate. That certainly seems to me to be rather a strong result.—p. 414.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I agree in the doubt insinuated rather than expressed by the learned judges, and more plainly intimated by my noble and learned friend, as to how Coles v. Bank of England might have been determined if it had not been disposed of in the way in which it was.—p. 415.

MELLISH, L.J.—In my opinion, it is still a doubtful question at law, on which I do not wish to give any decisive opinion, whether, if there be a false representation respecting the contents of a deed, a person who is an educated person, and who might, by very simple means, have satisfied himself as to what the contents of the deed really were, may not, by executing it negligently, be estopped as between himself and a person who innocently acts on the faith of the deed being valid, and who accepts an estate under it. I do not think that Swan v. North British Australasian Co.—a decision of which the learned V.-C. disapproves—is really a direct authority upon that question; because in that case a transfer of shares had been executed in blank: the person who executed it owned shares in two companies, and gave authority to the broker to fill them up with shares in one company, which were afterwards transferred to an innocent person. There the Court said that the whole thing was a forgery, and that the negligence of the transferor in executing the deed in blank was not the real and proximate cause of the loss, which was the forgery of the broker in filling the deeds up with shares differing from those which he was authorised to fill them up with. That decision does not go to the extent of saying that if the broker had filled them up with the same shares which he was authorised to insert, and therefore had done what he was authorised to do, that then, because it was void at law from being executed in blank, nevertheless the principal might not have been estopped.—p. 87.

BOWEN, L.J.—In Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Charities (Trustees), it seems to me to be clear that Parke, B., whose opinion was adopted by the learned lords who gave the judgment of the H. L., laid it down as the opinion of himself and the other judges, that the negligence which would deprive the plaintiff of his right to insist that the transfer in that case was invalid, must be negligence in or immediately connected with the transfer itself, and what he meant by that language I do not think can be left in doubt, first of all because he in using it expresses his concurrence with the Irish Ex. Ch. [12 Ir. L. R. 365], . . . in respect of that proposition, and because subsequently he proceeds to enlarge upon it and explain it himself. I have taken the trouble to verify the references to these judgments; and it appears to me that they all in different language and with different degrees perhaps of lucidity adopt the view that there was a difficulty in the way of the defence, which arose from the fact that the carelessness of the plaintiff in that particular case, even if it furnished an occasion for the loss which was sustained afterwards, had not directly led to it. But we are not left to pick out the meaning of Parke, B., from reference to the judgment of the Court below. He proceeds to explain what he means, and says, "If such negligence," that is, the negligence charged in the particular case, "could disentitle the plaintiffs, to what extent is it to go? If a man should lose his cheque-book, or neglect to lock the desk in which it is kept, and a servant or stranger should take it up, it is impossible in our opinion to contend that a banker paying his forged cheque would be entitled to charge his customer with that payment. It is clear, we think, that the negligence in the present case, if there be any, is much too remote to affect the transfer itself, and to cause the trustees to be parties to misleading the bank in making the transfer on the forged power of attorney." That that is the true explanation of what is not ambiguous or difficult language to interpret follows, it seems to me, from the decision of the Ex. Ch., by which we are bound in Swan v. North British & Co. and by the judgment of Blackburn, J., who, as the M.R. has pointed out, corrects a definition given by Wilde, B. in the Court below. He corrects it by saying that negligence to work an estoppel must be a proximate negligence, and it will not do if it is merely a remote one.—p. 174.

an application to rectify the register of a company by substituting the name of Sargent for that of Fry, who, being the registered owner of certain shares, had signed a transfer in blank to Cannon by way of security, and Cannon had transferred it in the same state to Sargent, who afterwards filled in his own name. Sargent does not appear to have claimed to stand as more than a transferee, with a right to get in the legal title of such interest as Cannon had when he handed over the documents: and Jessel, M.R. relied upon the power of every mortgagee "to re-borrow and to transfer his security." There were several communications between Fry and Sargent after the transfer, which may perhaps have been thought to amount to ratification, and Jessel, M.R. said that Mr. Fry's own counsel had admitted Sargent's equitable rights to have the shares transferred to him, which admission, in his lordship's judgment, covered the legal right also. If the case is to be thus explained, it is not an authority in point on the present occasion—if not, we should not be prepared to follow it—p. 588.

—LOPES, J.: affirmed (post, col. 536).

BRETT, M.R.—It was suggested at one time that the only meaning of that Act of Parliament (Companies Act, 1862), was that the company need not take notice on the register of any trusts—need not enter the trusts upon the register—so that the register would be kept simple and clear. After considering the matter I cannot accept that argument. For the moment it struck me very much; but although it was said to have been the suggestion of Westbury, L.C., in Stewart, Ex parte, yet I do not think his suggestion went that length, and I certainly do not think that that can be the meaning of the Act of Parliament. . . . With regard to Agra Bank, Ex parte, my own view of it is this, that the Court assumed without fully considering the point which is now before us, that by reason of notice the shares were not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, and therefore that case does not in any way decide the present point. Whether the Court may have overlooked the considerations which have been called to our attention in this case or not, is not material to consider when that case is treated, not upon appeal from it, but merely as an authority for a legal proposition.—pp. 439–441.

COTTON, L.J.—There is, I think, one decision only which can be quoted by the plaintiffs as in their favour, Martin v. Sedgwick. In that case, as reported, Lord Langdale held that the interest of a cestui que trust of shares must be postponed to the claim of a person holding a security apparently effectual only in equity, created by the trustee of the shares, of which he had given notice to the company, on the ground that the cestui que trust had given no notice to the company. If this was in fact the decision, this Court is not bound by it, and, I think, should decline to follow it, and indeed it must be considered as having been overruled by Pinkett v. Wright, afterwards affirmed in the H.L. But in Boulton, Ex parte, Turner, L.J. expressed himself in terms which strongly support the plaintiffs' contention. . . . The opinion which he expressed was not necessary for the decision of the case before him, which was one under the order and disposition clauses of the Bankruptcy Act. . . . In my opinion we ought not to be induced by respect for what he said to apply the rule established in Dearle v. Hall to dealings with property, to which in principle that rule is in our opinion not applicable.—p. 447.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The plaintiffs' title is also equitable only. They held a transfer in blank, and then filled it up, but notwithstanding the reference to it by the transferor in his letters of indemnity the transfer in its complete state was never seen by him, nor is there any evidence to show that he knew how it was filled up or the state in which it was, when it is contended that he ought to be treated as having re-delivered it. Had there been such evidence I should have been prepared to infer a delivery after the transfer had been duly filled up on the authority of Hudson v. Revett. . . . It has been held, and I think properly, that shares in companies governed by the Companies Act, 1862, are not choses in action within the meaning of the reputed ownership clause, sect. 15, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869: Union Bank of Manchester, Ex parte. . . . Under the circumstances of the case before Lord

Westbury [Stewart, Ex parte], it would have been a gross breach of faith towards the bankers and against their own interests, if the directors had allowed the shares to be transferred to the prejudice of the bankers. Lord Westbury's decision, therefore, was perfectly correct, but it is no authority for the general proposition that a company registered under the Companies Act, 1866 (or 1862), is bound to take notice of the beneficial interest in shares held by its members, or is bound to prevent a transfer by such members, simply because notice of a trust or equitable security is given to the company. I understand Lord Westbury's view to have been clearly contrary to such a proposition. Littledale, Ex parte, and Boulton, Ex parte, show that if shares in dock and railway companies are equitably assigned or are left standing in the name of a bankrupt, they pass to his assignees under the order and disposition clause, if no notice of the assignment is given to the company, but do not so pass if notice is given. In Littledale, Ex parte, the giving of the notice was considered as essential to perfect the equitable title, and as preventing a transfer by the registered shareholder—see 6 De G. M. & G. 734. Now, as the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act contains a section exonerating the companies to which it applies from noticing trusts, (and it did certainly apply to the company in question in Boulton, Ex parte, and probably also to the others,) these cases go a long way. In Littledale, Ex parte, however, the attention of the Court was not called to the trust section, but in Boulton, Ex parte, it was, and it is curious to observe how cautious the Court was. In Boulton, Ex parte, it was contended that the company had notice of the assignment, but the Court held the contrary. There was, therefore, nothing in that case to take the shares out of the reputed ownership of the bankrupt. Knight Bruce, L.J. said: "Whether the security could have been made safe against bankruptcy without a transfer I do not say: a transfer, however, was not promised, intended, or expected on either side." Turner, L.J. went a little further, and says this, "On the other hand it was contended on the part of the respondent that the shares could be equitably mortgaged, and that no notice to the company was required, but that if notice was required there was in this case sufficient notice. It is not necessary, I think, to give any opinion upon the question whether there can be a valid equitable mortgage of railway shares, and I do not mean therefore to give any opinion upon that point, but assuming that such mortgages can be made, I am of opinion that all the requisites which are essential to mortgages of other choses in action must be observed, and that notice to the company was therefore necessary." I understand this observation to mean in substance: "Assume that a notice to the company would have been effectual to take the shares out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt, still, as there was no notice, they were in his order and disposition." Agri Bank, Ex parte, appears at first sight to offer more difficulty. The C.A. there held that shares registered in the name of a bankrupt were not in his order and disposition, inasmuch as the share certificates had been deposited by him with his bankers as a security for a loan, and the directors knew it, although the bankers had given no notice to the company of their security. The Court there came to the conclusion that the directors could not properly have permitted a transfer, and it certainly looks as if the Court thought that the company was bound to recognise the equitable title of the bankers. This may have been so as regards the company then in question. The company was called the San Pedro del Monte Silver Mining Company, and it does not appear under what statute, if any, it was formed. No statutory enactment relating to the non-recognition of trusts was referred to in argument or noticed by the Court. Under these circumstances it would not be safe to take this case as deciding more than that the shares there in question were not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, inasmuch as the directors knew that the shares were not in fact the bankrupt's property. There are many other decisions on the reputed ownership clause, and its application to shares in companies, but they go no further than those I have noticed. When carefully examined, none of the cases on the reputed ownership clause decide that it is the duty of companies registered under the Companies Act, 1862 (or governed by any other statute containing such a clause as sect. 30), to attend to notices of equitable assignments of their shares.—pp. 449—454.

[The company was incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862. The articles of association provided that the shares should be transferable only by deed; that lost certificates might be renewed upon satisfactory proof of the loss, or, in default of proof, upon a satisfactory indemnity being given; and that the company should not be bound by or recognise any equitable interest in shares. Each certificate stated, under the company's seal, that no transfer of any portion of the shares represented by the certificate would be registered until the certificate had been delivered at the company's office.]

LORD SELBORNE—The C.A., without reference to the certificates, thought the principle of Dearle v. Hall inapplicable to shares of this kind; and I agree with them. I do not understand in what respect a notice not operative as against the company or its officers can have the effect of "perfecting" the equitable assignee's title. No authority was cited to show that the doctrine of Dearle v. Hall had been applied to such shares; and the reasons for that doctrine are, in my judgment, not applicable. The case is not like those under the bankrupt laws, in which the fact, or presumption of a continuance (after a change in the equitable title) of the prior state of "order and disposition," or reputed ownership, "with the consent of the true owner," has to be in some way disproved. But in the case before your lordships that was actually done by the company's engagement under the deed in the respondents' possession, which could not have been done by any mere notice.—p. 30.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is said there is a doctrine as to re-delivery to the effect that if a man executes a deed—that is to say, seals it—and then afterwards acknowledges it as his own, that will amount to a delivery. That may be true, and in Goodright v. Straphan that doctrine was carried to a considerable length; but in that case there was no alteration at all. The first authority which has been cited, in which there was an alteration, is Hudson v. Revett. There the person who had sealed the deed knew what the alteration was. It was altered in his presence, and he knew exactly the state in which the deed was. Knowing the condition in which it was, he assented to it as his deed, and it was held that amounted to a re-delivery. I follow that; but there is nothing of the sort here.—p. 801.

HALSBURY, L.C.—I have had an opportunity of considering the reasons of the noble and learned lord (Lord Blackburn) for the view he entertains, and in which I concur, that the judgment of the C. A. should be reversed, and the judgment of Field, J. restored. Nor should I desire to add anything to what he is about to urge, but I see some reference to the words of Lord Selborne with respect to the proposition that sect. 30 of the Companies Act renders it impossible for any company to be affected by notice of any trust, expressed, implied, or constructive. I was a party to the judgment of your lordships' House in . . . Société Générale, &c. v. Walker, and I certainly never imagined myself to be agreeing to a decision which could establish any such proposition, and the noble and learned lord, in whose words I have expressed my concurrence, gave no such reasons for his judgment. No such proposition was necessary for the decision of the case, and I wish to guard myself on the present occasion from being supposed to have so held.—p. 365.

LORD BLACKBURN.—Field, J. thought the point concluded by the decision of this House in Hopkinson v. Rolt. It was argued that the terms of the art. 103 here prevented the application of that case. Field, J. did not put such a construction on the article. . . . The M.R. (Sir W. B. Brett) and Baggallay, L.J. both expressed an opinion that inasmuch as the art. 103 stipulated for a "first and permanent" lien, the decision of this House in Hopkinson v. Rolt did not apply. Fry, L.J. did not go so far as to dissent from their opinion, but he certainly did not rest his judgment on that ground. As I understand it, the principle of Rolt v. Hopkinson is explained by Lord Campbell, L.C., and it is this: The owner of property does not, by making a pledge or mortgage of it, cease to be owner of it any further than is necessary to give effect to the security which he has thus created. And if the security is, as that in Hopkinson v. Rolt was, a security for present and also for future advances, the pledgee or mortgagee, though not bound to make fresh advances, may, if he pleases, do so, and will, if the property at the time of the further advance remains that of the pledgor, have the security of that property. . . . It seems to me to depend entirely on what I cannot but think a principle of justice, that a mortgagee who is entitled, but not bound, to give credit on the security of property belonging to the debtor, cannot give that credit after he has notice that the property has so far been parted with by the debtor. . . . I cannot assent to what I understand to be the reasoning of the M.R. and Baggallay, L.J. on the construction of the 103rd article. . . . This brings me to the second point on which all three judges of the C.A. agreed. . . . The effect of that section [Companies Act, 1862, s. 30] was much discussed in a case of Société Générale de Paris v. Tramways Union Co. decided by the C. A. on December 18, 1884. And of that decision the judges in the present case were aware. It was affirmed in this House under the name Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, not entirely for the same reasons, on December 17, 1885. The judges in the present case deciding, as they did, on July 14, 1885, could not know of that latter decision. I think that in order to bring this case within the principle of Hopkinson v. Rolt, it is not necessary to establish any trust as against the company. . . . The Earl of Selborne in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker said: "I think that according to the true and proper construction of the Companies Act, 1862, and of the articles of this company, there was no obligation upon this company to accept, or to preserve any record of, notices of equitable interests or trusts if actually given or tendered to them; and that any such notice, if given, would be absolutely inoperative to affect the company with any trust." I do not think it necessary to express any opinion as to this, for I do not think that the appellants in this case seek to affect the respondents with a trust; they seek no more than to affect them, in their capacity of traders, with knowledge of their (the appellants') interest.—pp. 367, 368.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The judgment of Fry, L.J. rests on the point arising on sect 30 of the Companies Act, in reference to which he seems to be of opinion that notice of the pledge to the company should not be deemed effectual for any purpose, and that the effect of the section is to exclude the application of Hopkinson v. Rolt. I cannot agree that the notice had no operation. . . . Although my noble and learned friend has correctly quoted the opinion of Lord Selborne on the effect of sect. 30, yet it is observable that the other noble lords who took part in the decision of the Société Générale v. Walker expressly refrain from deciding the case on that ground, and I do not find that Lord Selborne expressed any opinion that the notice may not have been operative for other purposes.—p. 369.

STIRLING, J., after reading from Lord Selborne's judgment in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, said: In reading this passage, the provisions of the articles of association of the company are doubtless to be borne in mind. So reading it, I think it may be inferred that the following propositions are sanctioned by his lordship's authority. First, a merely inchoate title by an unauthorised transfer is not equivalent, for the purpose of defeating a pre-existing equitable title, to a legal estate in the shares. Secondly, the title by transfer is to be deemed inchoate only (within the meaning of the last proposition) if not until a complete legal title is acquired, at all events unless and until all necessary conditions have been fulfilled to give the transferee as between himself and the company a present, absolute, and unconditional right to have the transfer registered before the company are informed of the existence of a better title. Thirdly, a company having notice of a prior equitable title are not necessarily bound to act upon a transfer which confers an inchoate title only, so as to effectuate a fraud till then incomplete. Lord Blackburn's speech in the same case is also of importance. . . . It would seem, therefore, to be his lordship's opinion that a company receiving a transfer for registration are not bound to act on it at once, even though in order, but are entitled to a reasonable time to make inquiries; and that if before the expiration of such reasonable time notice is given to them of the existence of a prior equitable title, they are not necessarily bound to proceed further. The inference seems to be that, until the company have in some way shown their acceptance of the transfer, the legal title is incomplete. Lord Watson concurs. Lord Fitzgerald does not consider it necessary to decide the point. The L.C. (Lord Halsbury) concurs with Lord Blackburn. Nanney v. Morgan . . . has an important bearing on the question at what point the legal title to shares becomes complete. That case was decided with reference to shares in a company governed by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845; but the ratio decidendi throws some light upon the question in the present case. The leading judgment is delivered by Cotton, L.J. . . . The reasoning on which these judgments are based seems to show that the transfer is not complete until everything has been done which is necessary to put the transferee into the position of the transferor; or possibly a narrower view may be, that where the transfer has to be left with the company, still it does not take effect until the officers of the company have examined it, and accepted it as properly left. . . . The officers of the company charged with the duty of receiving the transfer must examine it, and ascertain whether it complies with the requirements of the deed of settlement; and if it does not, it is their duty to reject it; and I think it follows, both from what is laid down by Lord Blackburn in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, and by the C. A. in Nanney v. Morgan, that it is not until this has been done and the transfer has been accepted by the company as a proper transfer, that it becomes effectual as between the company and the transferee. . . . In that case [Dodd v. Hills (supra, col. 532)] a sole trustee of shares executed a transfer of the shares and delivered it with the certificates to a mortgagee, who had no notice of the trust, but who afterwards received notice of the trust, and then got the transfer registered by the company. And the case may therefore be cited as an authority for the proposition, that where a person having an inchoate title completes his title by getting in the legal estates, he will not, as an ordinary rule, be deprived in favour of a person having only an equitable title of the advantage he has thereby obtained. But in the present case the company had notice of the breach of trust before the transfer was sent to them for registration (which does not appear to have been the case in Dodd v. Hills), and the legal title never was completed. This distinguishes the present case from Dodd v. Hills, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to consider whether all the propositions laid down by the V.-C. in that case are entirely consistent with the more recent decisions.—pp. 999–1001.

ROMILLY, M.R.—I fully admit, and in fact that was what I intended to decide in Shepherd's Case, that if a company find they are in a situation in which they cannot go on, and they think that it will be necessary to wind up, and are of opinion, after a proper investigation of the state of their affairs, that such is the case, and it is but fair to all persons connected with the company that the matter should remain in its then state, then they may make a resolution to make no transfers after that date, but always subject to this—that those transfers which they ought to have completed previously to such resolution cannot in any degree be bound or altered; but they are entitled to say, that those which they were not bound to complete before that time should not be completed afterwards, as was the case in Shepherd's Case. . . I am of opinion, therefore, that it was when the resolution was passed (and that is what I meant to decide in Shepherd's Case) that the line was drawn, and that the resolution affected all those transfers, and those only, which they had not been previously bound to complete according to the ordinary course of business without any improper delay.—p. 113.

COTTON, L.J.—We need not go through the books to show how constantly honest transfers registered before the commencement of the winding-up have been treated as effectual, although made when it must have been known that the company could not go on. In Chappell's Case and Allin's Case the company was entirely at an end by transfer of its business and property to another company. There it was held that there was no company; that the company, as far as the existence of the shares was concerned, might be considered at an end, and that after the company had ceased to have property or shares it could not be said to be a company in which the shareholders could transfer, so as to enable themselves to say they were no longer shareholders. Tenant v. City of Glasgow Bank (supra, col. 508) was of a different description. The question there was whether one who was on the register was not too late in commencing proceedings to get relieved from his shares on the ground of misrepresentation. Lord Cairns did not decide the point, but intimated an opinion that when a bank had become insolvent and stopped payment it was too late for a shareholder to exercise his option, and to avoid the contract to take shares. . . . There [Sand's Case] the question was whether the liquidator, who had only put on the list the English shareholders, could, in order to satisfy the claims for contribution, put on the list Indian shareholders. There was no voidable transaction at all which could be alleged to be confirmed by his delay. . . . That case [United Service Co., In re], so far as it goes, appears to me to be in favour of the view I have expressed, for in making an order for continuing the winding-up subject to supervision and a subsequent compulsory order, the view of the Court evidently was, that notwithstanding the compulsory order the winding-up would still commence at the time when the voluntary resolution was passed. I do not, however, rely on that case, for the facts are not fully stated, and the reasons do not appear. . . . The case [Thomas v. Patent Linoleum Co., nost. 6041] decides nothing, because there was undoubtedly a continuing process of distress during the time of the compulsory winding-up, a process which had not been made effectual before the presentation of the petition. Therefore the case does not show that the commencement of the winding-up was held by the Court to relate back to the voluntary resolution.—pp. 131—136.

TURNER, L.J.—The question appears to me to lie between the case of De Pass and the case of Hyam, and, until corrected by a higher authority, I retain the opinion which was expressed in the former instance—that the mere circumstance of difficulty existing in a company, where the shares are transferable by delivery, does not prevent the holder of those shares from making a bona fide and effectual sale of them. I do not see how, when the contract between the parties is that each man may transfer his shares, any one partner can have a right to complain of another for making that transfer at a time when the company may happen to be involved in difficulties. That was the principle upon which the case of De Pass was decided, and by that principle I am content to abide.—p. 117.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this case can be distinguished from Cox's Case in two most material particulars, both as respects what is the mere question of law, and also on the facts. In Cox's Case, Cox was one of the original promoters of the company, and he had agreed with the company, or perhaps, more strictly, with the other persons who were joining with him in forming the company, that he would take a certain number of shares; and then, in collusion with the officers of the company, he procured 200 of these shares to be registered in the names of persons who were, as the lords justices found, mere sham names; that is to say, names of persons who had no real interest in the shares; and he did that, as they also found, for the improper purpose of deceiving other persons who might become shareholders in the company. Now, under those circumstances, what in substance the L.J.J. did . . . amounted to granting specific performance of that contract, which Cox had entered into with the company.—p. 364.

KAY, J.—It was held in . . . Gilbert's Case, that a transfer of his qualification shares by a director was an improper proceeding. Lord Romilly said: "Whether a director can do that"—that is, transfer his qualification shares—"is a question which has never yet been determined, and I apprehend that he cannot. His situation is that of a trustee for the shareholders, and therefore he is not at liberty to do things which he does not think for the benefit of all the shareholders of the company—still less may he do so to gain pecuniary advantage to himself." That case went on appeal before Giffard, L.J., and he said: "I quite agree that because a man is a director he is not necessarily a trustee of the shares he holds for the general body of shareholders; and in a vast variety of circumstances he is just as free to deal with his shares—except perhaps his qualification, which he cannot deal with without giving up his directorship—as any other person." So that I have the authority of two eminent judges that a director cannot deal with his qualification shares as freely as he may with other shares. Looking at the doctrine of this Court, that a voluntary transfer to escape liability in some cases is a fraud, I cannot doubt that a director voluntarily transferring his qualification shares in order to escape liability is committing a fraud.—p. 331.

COTTON, L.J.—Parker, Ex parte, has no bearing at all upon the question as to what directors may do, because there the person seeking to transfer was not a director, but an ordinary shareholder, who induced the directors at a board meeting to postpone the consideration of a call, and then, before the call was made, executed a transfer of his shares to a pauper to evade liability. Rolt, L.J. said he could not do that, for he had represented to the directors, or led them to believe, that if they would postpone making a call he would not exercise his right to make a transfer. That case was founded on misrepresentation. The other case cited, Gilbert's Case was more in point, but the circumstances were entirely different. At a meeting of the directors of whom Gilbert was one, it was agreed that a call should be made, but no formal resolution was passed, and the actual making of a call was postponed until a later day when a formal resolution for the purpose was passed; but before that later day Gilbert had executed a transfer and got it registered, which he could not have done unless the call had been postponed, and it was held that as the call was postponed for a purpose which was not honest the registration of the transfer could not prevail against the company's creditors. But here there was nothing against Mr. Hallett which could make that case. —p. 233.

Wickes v. Gordon (1819) 2 B. & Ald. 335; 1 Chit. 60.

ABBOTT, C.J.—This application is founded upon a supposed variance between the declaration and the proof, and the attention of the Court has been directed to a case in Buller's Nisi Prius, which beyond all doubt is precisely in point. It seems to me, however, that that case cannot be supported in point of principle. What weight the learned person who edited that work attached to the law there laid down may be collected from the observation which immediately follows the case itself. Adverting to this and other cases, decided about the same time, he says, "These cases seem rather to be founded upon the times, to get rid of South Sea contracts, than to be relied upon as precedents in other cases." Buller, J. thought, therefore, that that case was not to form a rule of decision in future times; and in that opinion I most fully concur. p. 337.

BEST, C.J.—I can find no case in which the question whether the stock is transferred by the act of the bank has been raised. There is one in Barnardiston's reports, where a man of the name of Edward Harrison got South Sea Stock, which belonged to another Edward Harrison, put to his account in the books of the company, and then transferred this stock to his broker to sell, and which stock the broker sold. . . . In this case it seems to be assumed that the stock had passed out of the name of the owner by this transfer under a fraudulent assumption of his name, although he never assented to such transfer; but whether it had so passed or not was not considered, and I therefore cannot think this case any authority against our opinion if it were correctly reported. I think, however, that this case is not correctly reported by Barnardiston; the same case is to be found in 2 Atkyns, in the name of Harrison v. Harrison. In this report it appears that the stock was transferred by a trustee; and, if so, the question whether a transfer unauthorised by the stockholder would alter the property of the stock could not arise, the trustee having a legal authority to transfer, although he might be guilty of a breach of trust by exercising that authority. This circumstance also accounts for the doubtful way in which Lord Hardwicke speaks of the liability of the company to replace the stock. The question there was whether the South Sea company were bound to prevent a breach of trust, and not whether a stockholder's name can be taken from the books without his own authority; and the company that has permitted this act not be responsible for the consequence of it.—p. 406.

BOVILL, C.J.—That case [Sheppard v. Murphy] was in substance this: Sheppard had sold certain shares to Kennedy on the Stock Exchange, and Kennedy had sold an equal number of such shares to Murphy on a different day and at a different price, and in that respect the circumstances were similar to the present. The name of Murphy was passed to Sheppard as that of the transferee, and Sheppard executed a deed of transfer of the shares to Murphy and was paid the price; but Murphy did not sign the deed, and in a suit by Sheppard for indemnity against calls in respect of such shares, Murphy was held liable, although he had not executed the deed. The ground on which he was held to be liable was this: that he had caused his own name to be handed in as the transferee, paid the price, and requested the transfer of the shares to be made out to him. If Murphy had executed the deed of transfer, there would have been no doubt as to his liability, and as he had agreed to accept the shares, and was bound to execute the deed, the Court of Chancery, acting on the well-known principle of equity, held him to be just as liable as he would have been if he had executed the deed.—p. 123

JAMES, L.J.—The principle of those authorities of Grissell v. Bristowe and Coles v. Bristowe was explained in a judgment which I consider is binding on us. It is a judgment of this Court, of Hatherley, L.C., in the appeal of Cruse v. Paine from the V.-C., in which he distinguished the case by reason of there being a guarantee of registration, but he laid down what the principle of the other case was.—p. 770.

MELLISH, L.J.—The case comes within that decision of the Court of Ex. [Maxted v. Paine (first action)]; and the question we have to consider is, whether we ought to follow that case or treat it as overruled? Blackburn, J. in his very elaborate judgment in the second action of Maxted v. Paine, stated principles which certainly cannot be reconciled with the decision in the first action of Maxted v. Paine; indeed, he as much as said that he did not agree with it. Lord Romilly has also acted upon a principle, in the case before him about an infant [Rennie v. Morris], which cannot be reconciled with the principle upon which the Court of Ex. acted.—p. 772.

Paine* (first action) is an authority directly in favour of the view which I have submitted to your Lordships, and I am not aware of any authority opposed to it, except Rennie v. Morris, before the late M.R., with which decision I am bound to say I am unable to agree.—p. 580.

LORD HELMSFORD.—The two cases of Maxted v. Paine exemplify the distinction established by the authorities as to the performance or non-performance of the jobbers' contract. In the first action the defendant, the jobber, passed the name of a person as purchaser of the shares without his sanction or authority. The seller therefore could not compel him to accept a transfer of the shares. It was accordingly held that the jobber was not exonerated from liability upon his contract. In the second action the jobber was held to be released by having given the name of a nominee of the real buyer of the shares, a person of no means, but capable of contracting, and who in consideration of a small sum of money had consented to allow his name to be used as the proposed transferee of the shares. . . . Lord Romilly, in Rennie v. Morris, proceeded on an erroneous interpretation of the usage of the Stock Exchange with respect to the transactions of jobbers in the purchase of shares for a re-sale. He thought that a jobber had performed his contract when he had given a name to the seller's broker which was accepted, without regard to whether the person whose name was given (in that case, as in the present, an infant) was of ability to contract or not. But the language of the usage as proved affords no countenance to such a construction. The jobber is not required to give a name of a person merely, but to give the name of a person as the purchaser, meaning, of course, a person capable of becoming the purchaser, whose contract will be binding and enforceable against him. Bacon, V.-C. in deciding the present case, said: "I do not think I should be right in departing in the slightest degree from the judgment of the M.R. in Rennie v. Morris. The cases are identical." But the L.J.J. were of opinion, and I have no doubt correctly, that the case was not distinguishable on principle from Marted v. Paine (first action). There a person's name was given without authority. In the present case the infant was legally incompetent to give any authority. Therefore they considered that the decision in Rennie v. Morris could not be reconciled with the principle upon which that case of Marted v. Paine was decided.—p. 581.

CHITTY, J.—Coles v. Bristows involved directly the question of the jobber's liability, but the jobber could not be made liable unless some other person had come under a liability towards the plaintiff. The C. A. held that the jobber had been relieved of the liability which fell upon him by reason of his original contract to purchase, and that the liability which otherwise would have remained upon him was imposed in the circumstances of the case on the transferees, none of whom had executed the transfer. The C. A. could not have held, and did not hold, that the jobber was relieved, unless some other person had become liable. Though the exact decision was that the jobber was not liable, the decision involves the proposition that the transferees were. Lord Cairns says: "In these circumstances, the good faith of the transaction being in no way impugned, but being rather recognised by the plaintiff, we are of opinion that the proper conclusion to draw is, that the whole 200 shares and the transfers of them were duly accepted and paid for by the transferees, and that these transferees were in equity as much bound as if they had executed the deeds." Now the only ground on which the transferees were liable was by accepting the transfers, because they were not original parties to the contract with the plaintiffs. . . . I say, adopting Lord Cairns' view, that Davis has become equitable owner of the shares, and therefore it follows that as equitable owner of the shares he is bound to indemnify the person who legally holds the shares for him as the only and absolute cestui que trust.—p. 638. And see post.

KAY, J.—There a joint-stock company formed in India, registered under Indian law, and having its principal place of business in India, with an agent and a branch office in England, was ordered to be wound up under the Act of 1862, and Lord Romilly said: "I think I have jurisdiction to make the order; if the company is not wound up here, these persons will not be able to get their money." Now that case was decided in 1868, and no authority against it has been cited. Certain obiter dicta in a case in which the present point did not arise, and an observation in Lindley, L.J.'s book on Partnership have been referred to, but nothing amounting to this, that Commercial Bank of India, In re, was wrongly decided. V. WILLIAMS, J.—The point in that case was as to the meaning of "engaged in working mines" as used in sect. 81 of the Act of 1862. Sir J. Romilly, M.R. had held in East Botallack, &c. Co., In re, that a company was within the section if it was formed to work a mine in Cornwall, although it never possessed or worked a mine there. That decision was disapproved of in Silver Valley Mines, In re; but now sect. 81 has been repealed, and the new enactment (sect. 1, sub-sect. 4, of the Companies Act, 1890) substitutes for "engaged in working mines" the words "formed for working mines," and thus makes Lord Romilly's decision law. The jurisdiction can only be ousted by showing that the company is working a mine elsewhere than in the Stannaries jurisdiction.—p. 347.

NORTH, J.—It is said that that decision [Crookhaven Mining Co., In re] has been got rid of, in some way, by subsequent cases, three of which have been cited to me. But it does not seem to me that that decision is touched by the cases which were referred to. On the contrary in one of those cases—London and Caledonian, &c. Co., In re—it is clearly recognised that there may be rights existing against the liquidator in respect of what he has done in the course of his employment, matters for which the company itself could not be proceeded against, because it had been dissolved.—p. 561.

CHITTY, J.—I gave everybody who appeared separately his costs, whether he appeared as creditor or contributory, and whether he appeared to oppose or support the petition; but my reason for so doing was that in that case the petitioner refused to give any reason for the withdrawal of the petition, so that I could not go into the question as to the rights of the parties.—p. 463.

MORTH, J.—I think that the judgment of Chitty, J. in North Brazilian Sugar Factories, In re, has made this matter clear, and I shall follow that case, unless it shall be found upon inquiry that there is (as the registrar has suggested) a recent decision of the C. A. to the contrary . . . Chitty, J. said: ". . . the petitioner has abandoned his petition at the hearing. . . . The rule to allow one set of costs to creditors and one to shareholders appearing, only applies when a winding-up order has been obtained, and when the costs would have to come out of the assets of the company. In fact, the rule is founded on the protection of the company's assets. . . ." I see no reason in this case for departing from that rule merely because the petition has been presented by the company itself.—p. 53.

CHITTY, J.—Adopting the rule laid down by the late M.R. in Norton Iron Co., In re, I say that the second petitioner, Pooley, being aware of the presentation of the first petition, would have been right in going on with his petition had he been in a position to show that the first petition was not a proper petition, i.e., presented not in good faith or collusively. . . . As the M.R. points out in Norton Iron Co., In re, if a creditor presents a second petition merely on suspicion that the first is not bona fide, he does so at his own risk as to costs. . . . It was pressed upon me in argument that James, L.J., when V.-C., considered in United Ports, &c. Co., In re, that the date of advertisement regulated the order of priority. On looking through that case I cannot find that he said anything of the kind. . . . There certainly are some expressions of the V.-C. which look as though he thought that the advertisement tested the priority of proceedings, but if that was his rule, it was not adopted by the late M.R. in 1877, when he decided Norton Iron Co., In re. I find, too, in the report before James, V.-C., some statements and expressions from which I infer that the V.-C. considered both the first and second petitions improper; both appear to have been friendly petitions. If I had to choose between the two authorities, I think the right rule and the fair rule is that laid down by the M.R. in Norton Iron Co., In re. In London and Australian Agency Corporation, In re, I find there was one order on the three petitions, but the carriage of the order was given to a petitioner whose petition had been presented before though advertised after one of the other two. In that case all three petitions appear to have been properly presented, and Jessel, M.R., gave the carriage of the order to the petitioner who first presented his petition; he seems to have looked on priority of presentation as the right element in a case where there were no special circumstances, yet afterwards in Trades Bank Co., In re, on December 8, 1877, less than a month after Norton Iron Co., In re, he is reported to have adopted a different rule. In Trades Bank Co., In re, as appears from the Weekly Notes, the M.R. had in reality only one petition before him, Frodsham's. . . . In that case he allowed the rule as to priority of advertisement to prevail, the reporter adding—"I say reporter advisedly," because the M.R. never intended to overrule what he had just laid down in Norton Iron Co., In re: "Thus assimilating his practice to the other branches of the Court." This is not accurate. . . . My clerk has just handed me two old daily cause lists of December 8 and 15, 1877, from which I see that in Trades Bank Co. In re, Frodsham's Petition, was in the M.R.'s paper on December 8, and that on the 15th a winding-up petition in the same company, transferred from Hall, V.-C., was in his list. So that on the 8th he had, as a fact, only one petition, Frodsham's, before him.—pp. 143—146.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is said that the payment of interest is shown to be ultra vires by East of England Banking Co., In re. There there was a resolution of the directors shortly before the winding up of that company, which was never communicated to the depositors—a resolution to increase the rate of interest because other banks had done it; that resolution did not bind the company, and the creditors knew nothing about it. The liquidator, without consulting anybody, said that the higher rate of interest should be paid, and the Court held that he had no power to do that. That is very different from the present case, where the liquidators are doing nothing but that which they have been directed to do by the shareholders, who came together to decide what was to be done.—p. 593. LINDLEY, M.R.—The decisions of this Court that garnishee orders and balance orders are not final judgments, and therefore are not alone foundations for bankruptcy notices, are not inconsistent with our decision, for they turn upon the true construction of the Bankruptcy Act and the technical meaning of the words "final judgment." It is pointed out in Combined Weighing, &c. Co., In re, that a garnishee order absolute is not a final judgment.—p. 804.

ROMER, L.J.—That decision [Combined Weighing, &c. Co., In re] is binding on us. But seeing that in garnishee proceedings the order absolute contains an order that the garnishee do pay direct to the garnisher, the judgment creditor, I am surprised that the Court in the last-mentioned case did not see its way to hold that the judgment creditor there was entitled to petition to wind up the company.—ib.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The petitioner relies on the common expression that a creditor whose debt is undisputed and who cannot obtain payment is entitled ex debito justitiæ to a winding-up order. This is founded on the dictum of Lord Cranworth in Bowes v. Hope Mutual Life Assurance, &c. Society (supra) where his lordship says: "It is not a discretionary matter with the Court when a debt is established and not satisfied, to say whether the company shall be wound up or not; that is to say, if there be a valid debt established, valid both at law and in equity. One does not like to say positively that no case could occur in which it would be right to refuse it; but ordinarily speaking it is the duty of the Court to direct the winding-up;" and Lord Selborne in Western of Canada, &c. Co., In re (supra), expresses his agreement with that doctrine. This proposition is expressed in very general terms, but it has subsequently been almost universally considered that these remarks only apply as between the petitioning creditor and the company, and that where the interest of the body of creditors comes in, the Court will have regard to sect. 91 of the Companies Act, 1862. In the case of the Brighton Hotel Co. (supra), Malins, V.-C. held that the general expressions of Lord Cranworth must be qualified in cases to which that section applied, and in Western of Canada, &c. Co., In re, it was distinctly held that the section is applicable not only in proceedings under a winding-up order, but whenever a winding-up petition is before the Court. Here the opinion of the bondholders has been taken, and the petitioner stands alone in desiring a winding-up. . . . In the case of St. Thomas' Dock Co. the company desired a postponement, and it was ordered on undertakings being given. In Western of Canada, &c. Co., In re, there was a prima facie case for winding-up, but there was a prospect of money coming in from Canada, which might make it unnecessary. The petition was ordered to stand over to see whether the money would come in, and when the petition came on again, no money having arrived, a winding-up order was made. The decision of Kay, J., in the present case, seems to have been given in deference to that in Great Western, &c. Coal Consumers' Co. (supra), where Fry, J. ordered the petition to stand over. . . . I agree with the view that these cases must be dealt with according to their special circumstances. Another case has been referred to, which enunciates a doctrine to which I fully assent, and which has now for the first time to be considered by the C. A., viz.: Uruguay, &c. Ry. of Monte Video, In re. The headnote of that case gives the rule, to which I assent, and I need not go into the judgment: "As a general rule an unpaid creditor of a company is entitled to a winding-up order ex debito justitiæ; but that rule is subject to exceptions: e.g., where all the other creditors oppose the petition, and it appears that the petitioning creditor will not be in a better position by obtaining a winding-up order." I do not say that there may not be other cases in which the Court would dismiss the petition, but where the circumstances there mentioned by the M.R. concur, I think that it ought to be dismissed.—p. 265.

FEARSON, J.—It is said that the petitioner is entitled to recover the amount of his debentures only through the trustees of the deed, and that, therefore, he is not a creditor of the company, and cannot be entitled to a winding-up order, and for this purpose Uruguay, &c. Ry. of Monte Video, In re, has been cited. But when that case is looked at it appears that the covenant in the debentures to pay the money secured thereby was not entered into by the company with the bearer at all, but it was a covenant by the company with the trustees of the covering deed that the company would pay the bearer of the debenture, and Jessel, M.R. laid stress on this provision as showing that there was no direct debt from the company to the holder of a debenture, and that it was manifestly intended that the money should be recovered in the manner expressed in the trust deed, and in no other. In the present case the form of the debenture is entirely different. There is no covenant in it with the trustees of the deed, but there is an agreement by the company with the bearer of the debenture that they will pay him.—p. 282.

BOWEN, L.J.—The principle to be applied is that laid down in Chapel House Colliery Co., In re, namely, if putting in motion the statutory machinery for winding up cannot possibly accomplish the purpose for which such machinery was invented by the legislature, the Court will not make the order for winding up.—p. 192.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—As I understand the decisions, apart from the Act of 1890, it was settled law that, prima facie, a creditor whose debt was unpaid and who satisfied certain conditions precedent, was entitled to an order on his petition. That is stated to be the rule, and I do not understand that the rule as to the creditor's prima facie right to such an order has been altered by anything laid down in Chapel House Colliery Co., In re. It is a rule which, in its origin, had very high authority. It was laid down originally by Lord Cranworth [Bouca v. Hope Life Assurance Society (supra, col. 558)], and was assented to by Lord Selborne [Western of Canada, &c. Co. (supra, col. 558)]. But Chapel House Colliery Co., In re, does show that there are exceptions to the rule, and I agree that one of those exceptions is that, when those who oppose the making of a winding-up order can show that no possible benefit can accrue to creditors from making the order, it ought not to be made; à fortiori that is so when persons opposing the petition show, not only that the petitioning creditor will obtain no benefit from a winding-up order, but that a large proportion of the creditors are opposed to its being made.—p. 177.

WRIGHT, J.—There was a petition by a creditor whose debt was not yet payable, and a winding-up order seems to have been made upon it, but then he was a creditor—he was a creditor in the fullest sense, but payment of his debt was deferred under a scheme. . . . He was none the less a creditor, if the debt was due and had become payable, because payment had been suspended for a time; but here in the view that I take the petitioner is not a creditor at all—certainly not in respect of future interest, and with regard to the principal it seems to me that any right he once had has been waived.—p. 202.

BACON, V.-C.—Upon this point the authority of James, L.J. [In European Life Assurance Society, In re] is undisputed and is most directly in point. Mr. Jackson says I am not bound by the L.J.'s decision when he was V.-C. Nothing can be more clear than that I am not so bound, but I am justified in following that decision if my judgment goes along with it, and in my opinion a more wholesome rule has never been laid down, or one more useful in checking the abuses which might otherwise spring up under colour of these Acts. If it were otherwise, the moment a shareholder, or it may be 100 shareholders, were called upon by the company to pay up on their shares, it might be competent for each of them to file a petition for the purpose of staying off a payment which he was called upon presently to make. It would be an instrument of effectual ruin to companies if shareholders who owed the company money by not having paid their calls were allowed to come into Court with winding-up petitions. In my opinion the decision of the L.J. when V.-C. was a right one in principle, and if he had not so ruled I should have decided this case mainly on a similar view of the statements in the petition.—p. 387.

Co., In re*, which was followed in Sea and River Marine Insurance Co., In re, was a decision that the Court will never wind up a company which has only seven shareholders, I entirely dissent from that view. But I think the learned V.-C. did not intend so to decide.—p. 189.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—I do not think that Fox, Ex parte, goes the length of saying that where the Court has to consider whether it should take upon itself the adjustment of the rights of the shareholders of a company, the substratum of which is gone, it should not take into consideration the fact that the directors intend entering upon businesses which in the opinion of the Court are outside the memorandum of association. Mr. Buckley, in his work on the Companies Acts (7th ed., p. 245) says: "So where a company is proceeding to do something which is ultra vires, a shareholder has a right in an action, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders, to restrain the company, though every shareholder but himself be acquiescent; but has no right to come for a winding-up order under the 'just and equitable' clause;" and he cites Fox, Ex parte, as an authority in support of that proposition. It is plain, however, that that passage is a mere illustration of a previous passage on the same page, where he says, "There is no doubt that the 'just and equitable' clause gives the Court power to wind up a company in cases not coming under any of the first four heads, but there must be strong ground for exercising the power, at any rate at the instance of a shareholder." Without going into details, I repeat what I said during the argument, that the stringency of the quodam generis rule has of late been considerably relaxed.—p. 787.

PARWELL, J.—The authority relied upon by the company was Gold Co., In re, where the petition was that of a shareholder. Now, if sect. 145 [Companies Act, 1862] creates an absolute bar to a creditor unless he can prove that he is prejudiced, it must certainly create by necessary implication an absolute bar to a shareholder whether he is prejudiced or not. But the C. A. in Gold Co., In re, while expressing the view that if it had been open to them they would have been disposed to decide that sect. 145 was such a statutory bar, felt themselves prevented from so deciding by the judgments of their predecessors, and V. Williams, J., made an order in Varieties, Ltd., In re, on this footing. . . . But since the case was argued my attention has been called to three cases which were not cited. . . . The first is West Hartlepool Ironworks Co., In re. There does not appear, from the report of that case, to have been any evidence that the petitioner would be prejudiced; but sect. 145 was cited, as appears from the report of the case in the Weekly Reporter and the Law Times Reports—and I cannot suppose that it was not present to the mind of the Court—and it would have been a very short mode of disposing of the case if sect. 145 had the effect contended for by the company. Mellish, L.J., treats the case as depending entirely on the wishes of the creditors, and his judgment is quite inconsistent with the idea that sect. 145 overrides sects. 91 and 149. In New York Exchange,

In re, the point decided was that the petitioning creditor was affected by sect. 145, although he had presented his petition before the resolution was passed. There was nothing in this case contrary to the view that I have expressed: indeed Fry, L.J., refers to sect. 91 as being applicable to the case before the Court; but it did not assist the petitioner, because the other creditors who appeared opposed the compulsory order. The last case is Russell, Corder & Co., In re. The point really decided in that case was that the Companies Act. 1890 had not altered the law under sect. 145 of the Act of 1862; and the petitioner stood alone, being opposed by all the other creditors who appeared. This, therefore, is not a decision contrary to the view that I have expressed, and North, J., expresses no opinion on it, although he suggests the point by asking the question, in the course of the argument, whether, if all the creditors desired a compulsory order, they would be entitled to it, unless they came within the words of sect. 145. . . . Taking the view I do, it is unnecessary that the petitioner should allege prejudice to the petitioning creditors. But, if it were necessary, I am prepared to follow V. Williams, J., in Medical Battery Co., In re, and to hold that the creditors under the circumstances in this case are prejudiced by the voluntary winding up.—p. 515.

CHITTY, J.—In London Quays, &c. Co. the L.JJ., Cairns and Selwyn, imposed on the voluntary liquidator the same restrictions as an official liquidator would be subject to in a compulsory winding up, except so far as the Court should think fit to dispense with those restrictions. That is an authority for the exercise of the jurisdiction imposing restrictions. Now, turning to the 183rd section of the Act of 1862, I find in sub-sect. 7, "The liquidators may, without the sanction of the Court, exercise all powers by this Act given to the official liquidator." Turning to the 95th section, which confers powers on the official liquidator, I find that there are restrictions placed upon the exercise of certain powers, the 95th section being completed by the 96th, which provides that, "The Court may provide by any order that the official liquidator may exercise any of the above powers without the sanction or intervention of the Court," and in the Rochdale Property, &c. Co. the Court made an order giving the official liquidator power to do all acts without the previous sanction of the Court, thus giving to a compulsory winding up the effect of winding up under supervision. That is the converse case to London Quays, &c. Co., In re. These cases are of use as showing that the Court has jurisdiction, and has exercised the jurisdiction, which, for practical purposes, turns the winding up by the Court very nearly into a winding up voluntarily under supervision; and, vice versa, turns a winding up under supervision almost into a winding up by the Court.—p. 475.

CHITTY, J.—It is said, in order to come to the conclusion at which I have arrived, I must be overruling Lord Hatherley's judgment in Harding, Ex parte. I consider that not to be so. The case that Lord Hatherley was considering when V.-C. was the case in which, as I understand the report, the business of the company as such was continued. No doubt if that were the case, the liquidator having continued the business, there might be grounds for saying, and the V.-C. found there were grounds in that case for saying, that either the notice had been waived or there was a new contract on the same terms. I think that . . . Chapman's Case and Harding, Ex parte, can stand together. I am satisfied that Lord Hatherley did not intend, if even he had the authority so to do, to overrule Chapman's Case, and in the report I find, so far from thinking he was overruling it, Lord Hatherley said he thought there were sufficient facts in the case before him to take it out of the M.R.'s decision in Chapman's Case. This is an acknowledgment of the authority of the case itself.—p. 372.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The difficulty which has arisen is attributable to some words reported to have been used by me, and which, if I did use them, were uttered unintentionally in Barnard, Ex parte. In a report of that case, which was referred to before us, and in a shorthand note read before V. Williams, J., I am reported to have said twice over that in order to justify an order for public examination under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, sect. 8, sub-sect. 3, the least that is required is that there should be a written report upon the responsibility of the official receiver that in his opinion some fraud has been committed by the person to be examined. If I did say that, I expressed myself incautiously, because that was not the meaning of any of us. I will proceed to state exactly what I understand to be the view taken by the Court on that occasion, and the view taken by the Court on this occasion. First of all, we stated in Barnard, Ex parte, intentionally and deliberately, that "such report" in sub-sect. 3 means the report referred to in sub-sect. 2. That produces no inconvenience, and I am satisfied that it is the true construction, and I abide by it. Secondly, we have to decide now what we had not to decide in Barnard, Ex parte, namely, whether these applications can be made ex parte. [His lordship then decided that they could, and the other, L.J.J. concurred, and continued:] Now, what are the materials upon which the Court ought to act? In Barnard, Ex parte, we had no materials, for there was no report that Barnard had taken any part in the promotion or formation of the company or been a director or officer, and we held that a verbal statement by the official receiver to the judge that Barnard had been a promoter could not be acted upon. . . . It is not necessary for the official receiver to draw an indictment against that person to be examined, and I feel certain that we said so during the argument in Barnard, Ex parte.—pp. 341–343.

LOPES, L.J.—The judgment in Barnard, Ex parte, seems to have been somewhat misunderstood. I am perfectly clear what my view was, and I certainly thought it was the view of my learned brethren, namely, that there must be a report that in the opinion of the official receiver a fraud has been committed by somebody, but that the particular person or persons who were parties to it need not be named in order to apply this sub-section.—p. 343.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my judgment the headline of Barnard, Ex parte, in the report to which we have been referred [40 W. R. 625] must be altered. I am not sure that I had not a hand in making the headline wrong by what I said in the last part of my judgment; but I certainly did not intend to say what this headline says, although I think the reporter might well have thought I meant it. The headline runs: "The Court has no jurisdiction to direct a person to attend and be publicly examined under sect. 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, unless it has before it a report in writing of the official receiver stating that, in his opinion, a fraud has been committed." That is right enough; but it goes on "by such person," that is the point which we have to decide to-day. I remember perfectly, as Lindley, L.J. has stated, a discussion going on about an indictment; and I remember that we negatived the necessity of an indictment or anything like it being contained in the reports.—p. 344.

 LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion we must refuse this application, in fact, we cannot do otherwise if we are to be consistent with our previous decisions. It appears to me now, as it did on the two former occasions, that we construed the Act rightly, and that there is no power to put in force this process of public examination upon a report by the official receiver which does not show upon its face that some fraud has been committed, though not necessarily, as we have carefully explained, by a particular person. There is always a great danger in going beyond or varying the language of an Act; but, adhering, as I do to the view that "such report" in sect. 8, sub-sect. 3, means a "further report" and not the preliminary report, it follows that, although the official receiver need not make a further report, yet, if the Court is to order a public examination under this section, it must have before it a report such as is referred to in sub-sect. 2. . . . The exact language in which he is to state it is another matter; and in Trust, &c. Corporation of South Africa, In re, this Court held that the report was sufficient if it showed fraud—that is, when the fraud was manifest on the face of the report the Court did not think it necessary to send it back to the official receiver in order to compel him to say in black and white that, in his opinion, fraud had been committed. That decision has been since interpreted in a way which is too lax. We did not intend in any way to depart from the requirement of the Act. But our observations have been understood as meaning that it would be sufficient if in his report the official receiver "suggested" fraud. The word "suggest" is very ambiguous. What we meant was, that circumstances must be stated in the report which show that the official receiver is of opinion that some fraud has been committed. If the report shows that, I think it is unnecessary that we should act (so to speak) as drill sergeants, and insist that there should be in the report a paragraph stating in so many words that which is apparent on the face of it. But I think it is time for us to protest against the notion that we went the length of saying that a "suggestion" of fraud would be sufficient.—p. 195. A. L. SMITH, L.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Barnes, Ex parte, has removed one point in controversy, which was, what is the "report" referred to in sub-sect. 2 of the section [sect. 8]. . . . Barnes, Ex parte, has made it plain that such report is what is called the further report, and not what is called the preliminary report. . . . The result of Barnes, Ex parte, appears to me to be tolerably plain. There must be a report stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether, in the opinion of the official receiver, fraud has been committed by any person proposed to be examined. That is not found in the Act; it is added by the H. L. in Barnes, Ex parte. And the

H. L. were led to add it by construing sub-sect. 3 in connection with sub-sects. 2 and 7.—p. 166.

CHITTY, L.J.—As to the decision in Barnes, Ex parte, I have nothing to add to what the M.R. has said, except to say that in that case there was no charge of fraud made in the report, nor was there any statement of fact from which fraud could be inferred against the persons who were named as persons to be examined.—p. 170.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—Speaking for myself, I should hesitate very much to say that a mere narrative as to "the manner" (to use the very words of the section) of the formation of the company, coupled with a statement that in the opinion of the official receiver fraud had been committed by A. B., would be sufficient to justify an order for the examination of A. B. I do not say that the judgment of the H. L. in Barnes, Ex parte, is at all conclusive as to this point. But it does suggest that the statement of that opinion by the official receiver must be in such a shape that it can be said that there is a charge made against the person sought to be examined, of such a kind that he can either exculpate himself or be incriminated. . . . The spirit of the decision of the H. L. is that you are not to make an order for the examination of any one unless he falls within those categories; and unless the judge is satisfied on the report that the report does make such a charge against the person sought to be examined that he can know what it is that he must exculpate himself from, or, if he fail, be convicted of.—ib.

 MALINS, V.-C.—This case differs from Maude's

Case. In that case there was no issue of new capital, but the shareholders had a right to anticipate their calls. Some had and some had not done so; but Mr. Maude, as I understand, had anticipated his calls, and it was urged before me, and I thought there was great force in the argument, that, inasmuch as he had paid up his call, he was entitled to a greater amount of profit, if profit had been made, and so, having had a greater amount of profit, he could only share with the others according to what he had paid when the division of profits took place. This is a case in which the company being, as I have already pointed out, in great distress, with no possible chance of success except with the addition of fresh capital—fresh capital is provided by these new shareholders. Therefore, my opinion is that, in the winding up, the capital ought to be divided amongst the old shareholders and the new shareholders in proportion to the amount which they have respectively advanced.—p. 639.

LORD HERSCHELL.—Some stress was laid in the Court below upon the decision in *Sheppard v. Seinde, &c. All the noble and learned lords who took part in the consideration of that case in this House rested their opinions upon the very special facts of the case, and intimated that they were not laying down any general principle.—p. 125. [His lordship also discussed Anglesse Colliery Co., In re, and Maude, Ex parte (supra, col. 570).] LORD FITZGERALD concurred, and referred to Oakbank Oil Co. v. Crum.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The question involved in this appeal appears to be novel. No direct authority on the point was cited. Nor am I aware of any, except a decision of Stirling, J., in London and Brighton Stock Exchange, In re, . . . Sheppard v. Seinde, &c. Ry., which was treated as an authority in the Courts below, has since been reviewed in this House: and in affirming the decision of the C. A., every one of the noble and learned lords who addressed the House relied simply and solely on the special circumstances of the case.—p. 131.

WRIGHT, J. — In Moude, Ex parte (supra, col. 570), there was in the company's articles of association no express provision for regulating the distribution of surplus assets. The shares had been unequally called up. After payment of the debts and expenses there remained a balance, as in the present case, insufficient for the return of all the paid-up capital. It was held that the real question was not how profits should be distributed, but how a loss should be borne, and that the uncalled capital was as much liable to be called up for the purpose of meeting this loss as it would have been for the payment of debts; and the result was that after the capital account had been equalised by calling up, or treating as called up, unpaid capital, the whole resulting balance was returned in proportion to the amount paid up on each share—that is to say, to its nominal amount, and every shareholder lost the same percentage of what he had subscribed and paid. In Birch v. Cropper there was again no provision for regulating the distribution of the surplus assets. The shares had been unequally called up. There was a large real surplus—that is, more than enough for the return of all the paid-up capital. North, J. and the C. A. held that the paid-up capital must be returned, and the balance distributed in proportion to the amounts which had been paid up on the several classes of shares, but the H. L. held that after the capital paid had been returned the balance must, in the absence of any different provision in the memorandum or articles of association, be distributed in proportion to the nominal amount of the shares. Thus all equities were satisfied by the return of all capital paid, and there remained no reason for treating the surplus assets as held for the shareholders in proportions differing from the amounts of their shares. In the present case there is an express provision regulating the distribution of assets after payment of debts and expenses . . . There is no real surplus. . . . Under these circumstances . . . there is no room for the application of Birch v. Cropper.—p. 181.

WRIGHT, J. — The ground of the decision [Somes v. Currie] seems to have been that on the particular facts of the case, and especially the fact that dividends had during three years been distributed according to the amounts paid up, the V.-C. held that there had in effect been a contract between the shareholders that "the profits and advantages" should be so distributed. It is pointed out by the C. A. in Sheppard v. Scinde, &c. Ry. that Somes v. Currie cannot be considered as suggesting any general rule, and a disapproval of it, if so considered, is plainly implied . . . There [Sheppard v. Scinde, &c. Ry.] it was held, both in the C. A. and in the H. L., that the surplus was divisible according to the amounts paid up on the different classes of shares; but that decision, again, was expressly based on its own peculiar circumstances.—p. 250.

WRIGHT, J.—The fully-paid shareholders say that they are entitled to the full proportion which their paid-up capital represents, and that the others are only entitled to the proportion represented by 10s. per share. On the other hand, the partly-paid shareholders say that, according to cases like Birch v. Cropper, the division should be in accordance with the number of shares, irrespective of the amount paid up. If there were no provision in the articles as to the method of distribution to be adopted, it would be tolerably clear that after the capital amount had been properly dealt with the balance would be distributable share and share alike. But there are two articles which must now be considered . . . The distribution must be in accordance with the agreement shown by the articles—that is to say, the balance after repaying the paid-up capital must be divided in proportion to the paid-up capital.—p. 418.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—Although the question is not raised on this summons, it has been suggested that the inconvenience of having the two liquidations pending in different Courts might be got over by transferring the proceedings which are pending in the City of London Court, for the winding-up of the building society, to this Court. But, in my opinion, there is no power to make such a transfer. That seems to be the effect of the decision of North, J. in London and Suburban Bank, In re. . . . NORTH, J.—I think that I ought to grant an injunction, and I do so upon the authority of Oriental Island Steam Co., In re, where the matter was put in this way. It was said that the assets of the company were held upon a trust, as it were, for the persons entitled to them. The Court treated the position of the claimant in that case upon the footing that one cestui que trust had got possession of trust property after the property had been subjected to the trust. That being so, the cestui que trust was obliged to bring it in for distribution with the other property of the trust. That is the principle applied there; and it seems to me to apply here in the same way.—p. 411.

JESSEL, M.R.—There are, however, three decisions of Lord Romilly, all of which are in point as regards principle, and in the last of these the facts are very nearly those of the present case. It is true there is a decision of Stuart, V.-C. which seems to be at variance with the cases to which I have referred, but in it the circumstances were quite different, and I do not think it is really in opposition to the principle which has been laid down. . . . There [Keynsham Co., In re] the creditor had begun his action before the commencement of the winding-up; the liquidators applied to the Court to stay the action, and the M.R. granted an injunction, and said that he thought the practice was analogous to the staying of actions after a decree for administration, and that the creditor ought to have his costs down to the time when he had notice of the winding-up, such costs to be added to his debt. . . . There [Life Association of England, In re], also, the creditor commenced his action before the commencement of the winding-up, and, upon an application for an injunction, the M.R. says this: "There is clearly an analogy between this and a suit for administration. If the executor does not admit assets, the costs of the creditor can only be added to his debt; but if assets are admitted, and the debt not disputed, the creditor's costs would at once be paid. In this case I can only grant the application on condition, first, that Mr. Whitty (the creditor) be allowed to see the proceedings on the winding-up, and, secondly, to prove for his debt, which must include the costs of the action at law, as well as the costs of this motion. If the action had been commenced after notice of the resolution to wind up, I should certainly not have allowed the costs." In that case, the attention of his lordship does not appear to have been called to the difference between a liquidation by the Court and a purely voluntary liquidation, under which a creditor has no means of coming in and establishing his claim; so that perhaps it may be considered that the last part of the judgment cannot be fairly used as an authority. . . . There [Peninsular, &c. Banking Co., In re], in January, 1866, after the winding up commenced, an action was brought by a creditor on bills of exchange, and on February 15th the creditor would have been entitled to sign judgment. On February 15th a motion was made to stay proceedings. The M.R. said: "I will stay execution only, and the creditor can come in under the winding-up. He can add his costs to his debt; I cannot make him pay costs." The creditor was represented by eminent counsel, and the attention of the M.R. must have been called to the distinction between a compulsory and a voluntary winding-up, and it could hardly have been disputed that the creditor had notice of the winding-up; at all events, the decision was that the costs were to be added to the debt. Then the decision in Levick, Ex parte, is said to be contrary to these. There the action was brought by the liquidators after the commencement of the winding-up, and, I presume, in the name of the company. The action was unsuccessful, and the defendants became entitled to recover their costs from the plaintiffs; but they were not creditors except in that sense. Stuart, V.-C. held that the act did not apply, inasmuch as they were not creditors at the commencement of the winding-up; if they had been creditors at that time, I presume he would have followed the decisions of the M.R. I think in the present case I must follow those decisions which appear to me to have established the practice.—p. 270.

JESSEL, M.R.—In the Exhall Coal Mining Co.'s Case, the actual tenant was a trustee for the company, and the company was a stranger. The landlord there put in a distress after the winding-up petition was filed. The question was whether sect. 163 avoided the distress, and the distress was held to be valid. . . . Knight Bruce, L.J. said there was nothing in the Act rendering it incumbent upon the Court to say when a distress has been put in force before the making of the winding-up order that the company was then being wound up within the meaning of sect. 163. This was a mistake. The words are not "after the winding-up order," but "after the commencement of the winding-up." Turner, L.J. did not take this view, but concurred, for the reason that sect. 163 of the Act must be construed as only avoiding attachments, sequestrations, distresses, or executions, when leave to put them in force has not been given under sect. 87. As they differed in their reasons, I may take my own view. . . . There [Lundy Granite Co., In re] the company was not the tenant; they were equitable owners of the lease. The landlord distrained after the order to wind up. The M.R. held the distress was not valid, but was reversed on appeal. The L.J.J. drew this distinction—that sect. 163 had no reference to a case where the right of the landlord was not that of a creditor of the company, but a right to take goods to whomsoever they belong. I do not find the exact words there, but that is the meaning. In the case before them the landlord was not a creditor, and to have taken away his right and given nothing in return, would have produced not equality, but inequality. It amounts to this—that where a landlord is a stranger and not a creditor at all, and where he seizes strangers' goods on his land, sect. 163 does not apply. This can be gathered from their words. James L.J. says, "We must consider what is the position of a stranger under the Act." I think this must mean as far as regards the goods of the company. Mellish, L.J. says, "The landlord is by the law of the country entitled to take as a security for his rent the goods upon his land, whomsoever they belong to. Then was it intended to deprive the landlord of that right if the goods happened to belong to a company under liquidation? It would be very extraordinary if the legislature had deprived the landlord of that right without clear and express words, and without giving him any compensation." This proposition commands my most cordial assent. Both the L.J.J. took a very sensible view of the Act. It would have been monstrous to say the landlord could lose his right without being able to sue the company. But here there is an attempted preference by one creditor, attempted after the winding-up.—p. 173.

It appears to me that the case was decided upon the ground of beneficial occupation. . . . In Watson, Kipling & Co., In re . . . the rates were not made for several months, and some of them for more than a twelvemonth after the commencement of the winding-up, and the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived, rightly or wrongly, was this, that there was no beneficial occupation at the time when the rate was made, and that was the ground of the decision. It appears to me that it was rightly decided.—p. 472. BOWEN, L.J. concurred.

COTTON, LINDLEY AND BOWEN, L.JJ.

COTTON, L.J.—Undoubtedly Turner, L.J. in Exhall Coal Mining Co., In re, said that those two sections [sects. 87 and 163 of the Act of 1862] must be read together, notwithstanding the precise words of sect. 163, and that the Court has power to authorise a distress, which must come within the word "proceeding" in sect. 87. . . To my mind it is doubtful whether, having regard to the express words of sect. 163, which says, "that any distress shall be void," it is right to say that sect. 87 included distress in the proceedings which the Court might allow. There are other proceedings in the nature of actions and modes of enforcing claims against the company which undoubtedly would satisfy sect. 87, without including in the word "proceeding" a distress, which is in terms dealt with under sect. 163. But it would be very wrong for us to depart from the decisions which have followed the judgment of Turner, L.J. in Exhall Coal Mining Co., In re, which was decided as long ago as 1864. Following that, and taking that as the rule on which we must act, what is the rule which has been laid down not inconsistent with the cases? It is this: that it lies upon the landlord who applies to put in a distress to show that there are circumstances which justify the Court in depriving the company, and the creditors of the company, of the benefit of the express provision of sect. 163. . . It is unfortunate, perhaps, that a good many of the cases on these two sections, and on applications like this, have not dealt with the matter as directly as they might have done. In one authority which has been referred to—Lundy Granite Co., In re (supra, col. 580)—the question really did not arise; and it is only some general observations of James, L.J., which, with all respect, were not applicable to the case before him—which are relied on as laying down what the doctrine is.—p. 763.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—There have been differences of opinion in the cases decided, and no amount of legal ingenuity could maintain that all the judgments which have been delivered could stand together. I give up that task myself as being too difficult. I adopt the view taken by Bowen, L.J. in National Arms, &c. Co. No case later in date than that has been cited before me. I do not say that that case is a decision of the C. A. in favour of the view I am about to take; but Bacon, V.-C. had in West Hartlepool Iron Co., In re, suggested that the test whether the rates were payable in full was whether there had been a beneficial enjoyment by the liquidator; and Bowen, L.J. in National Arms, &c. Co., In re, said, "I wish to add that I am not satisfied that the test given by Bacon, V.-C. in West Hartlepool Iron Co., In re, is the true one. I am disposed to think that the true test is whether there has been a beneficial occupation within the ordinary meaning of those words in cases as to rating, and I wish to leave this question open in case it should ever call for decision." I intend to adopt that view. . . Under the circumstances the test applied by Bowen, L.J. is much the plainest and simplest. Here it is said that the liquidator occupied in a beneficial way, and it cannot be disputed that he did. Having said that, I wish to make one observation as to the effect of the decision of the Court, as distinguished from the observations of the judges, in National Arms, &c. Co., In re. After the decision in that case, it is impossible to say that Watson, Kipling & Co., In re, can stand as an authority, so far as it distinguishes the case of rent from that of rates. In National Arms, &c. Co., In re, all the L.J.J. decided the question before them on the basis that rents and rates were to be dealt with on the same principle. . . This case is really unangable unless reliance is placed on the test applied by Bacon, V.-C. in West Hartlepool Iron Co., In re, that mere possessory occupation is not sufficient to render the liquidator liable. Having regard to subsequent cases, that test no longer stands. In Oak Pits Colliery Co., In re, Lindley, L.J. says: "No authority has yet gone the length of deciding that a landlord is entitled to distrain for or be paid in full rent accruing since the commencement of the winding-up, where the liquidator has done nothing except abstain from trying to get rid of the property which the company holds as lessees." He does not, however, go the length of affirming the test of Bacon, V.-C. If the liquidator deliberately chooses to occupy premises, and thinks that loss will be avoided by waiting before selling them, the rates ought to be paid in full.—p. 405.

LINDLEY, L.J.—There may be circumstances which, notwithstanding the absolute prohibition contained in sect. 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, will justify the Court in giving leave to distrain. The principles which should be applied in dealing with an application by a mortgagee are fully and accurately explained in Lancashire Cotton Spinning Co., In re, the Court having previously explained in Oak Pits Colliery Co., In re (supra, col. 582), the principles applicable in the case of a landlord. The distinction is against the mortgagee. It is easier for a landlord to make out a case for leave to distrain than for a mortgagee, and the reason is obvious. It would be very unjust that a landlord's property should be made use of by a company or its creditors for the carrying on of the business, and that he should be paid nothing for it. It is not the same in the case of a mortgagee. He has the benefit of his security, and if the property of the company is so managed by the liquidator that it becomes of increased value, and sells for a better price than it would have otherwise, that is as much for the benefit of the mortgagee as of the other creditors. That appears to be the ratio decided in Lancashire Cotton Spinning Co., In re, in which case it was held that the mortgagees ought not to be allowed to distrain. For the Court to give leave for that it was said, there must be some conduct on the part of the company, or its liquidator, which would make it unjust not to give it. That is quite consistent with what was said by Fry, J. in Brown, Bayley and Dixon, In re (supra, cap. 582). I think that this case is in principle entirely governed by Lancashire Cotton Spinning Co., In re.—p. 772.

COTTON, L.J.—Kay, J. [in the Court below] was right in holding that as against the debenture-holders the landlord had a right to distrain on the furniture and chattels, and therefore that he had a right to the proceeds of the sale of the property. But the learned judge went further: he held that as between the company and the landlord the landlord had a right to distrain; but said that he would have come to a different conclusion if it had not been for . . . Clemence, Ex parte. We need not enter into the question whether Fry, L.J. was right in that decision. It must not be taken that we approve of that decision, but we leave it to be dealt with when the occasion shall arise.—p. 661.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, LORD HALSBURY and A. L. SMITH, L.J.).—Notwithstanding the very comprehensive language of this section [Companies Act, 1862, s. 158], Giffard, L.J. when V.-C. decided in Horsey's Claim that, as it was impossible to put a just estimate on the claim of a landlord to future rent and possible breaches of covenant, he was not entitled to prove against a limited company being wound up and to receive a dividend on his proof; and this view prevailed until a comparatively recent date.

But after the decision of the H. L. in Hardy v. Fothergill, which must be considered in connection with sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, it is difficult, if not impossible, to say that Mr. Craig could not have had his claim valued and have proved for its value against the old company. Mr. Craig, however, does not really want to do this. What he wants is to enter a claim with a view to have assets of the old company set apart for his indemnity before they are divided amongst the shareholders; or, if he is not in time for that, he asks that the old company may not be formally dissolved so long as he is exposed to liability under his covenants. He bases his claim in this respect on certain decisions in which a lessor of a limited company being wound up or applying for leave to reduce its capital has been held entitled to enter a claim for the amount of rent and royalties which may become due to him in future, and to an injunction to restrain the company from distributing its assets and dissolving without making proper provision for his payment. The cases in which orders to this effect have been made are: Telegraph Construction Co., In re; Oppenheimer v. British, &c. Investment Bank; Gooch v. London Banking Association, and Elphinstone (Lord) v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. The last of these cases was in the H. L., and the House made an order in favour of the lessor of a limited company, which was being wound up voluntarily, and declared that the lessee company was bound to fulfil its future obligations under its lease, and that the liquidators were bound to make due provision for fulfilling such obligations, and to set aside assets of the company in their hands for that purpose. It is true that this was a Scotch case, and a case between lessor and lessee, but we see no reason to suppose that there is any difference between English and Scotch law in this respect. The effect, however, of the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill on the right of a lessor to have the assets of a limited company which is being wound up impounded has not yet been judicially determined. The English decisions in favour of his right to enter a claim and have assets impounded to meet it have all proceeded upon the view that the lessor could not prove for any ascertainable sum and be paid a dividend upon it and on some future occasion those decisions will have to be reconsidered. In the present case it is not necessary to solve this new problem, and we say no more about it.—p. 282.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—In Hardy v. Fothergill the lease had expired, and the assignee actually obtained his discharge before the lessee claimed to be indemnified. In bankruptcy there would be no difficulty in dealing with the proof, but in winding up the term is still vested in the company. Hardy v. Fothergill is not a decision that, without more, all future rent can be proved for at once in a winding-up.—p. 756.

In Craig's Claim (supra) Lindley, L.J. intimates that Hardy v. Fothergill has altered the law as to proofs in winding up. . . . Hardy v. Fothergill seems to apply only where there is a disclaimer. But in winding up the liquidator cannot disclaim, and the rule can only be applied in winding up where there is a surrender or a repudiation of the lease which is accepted by the lessors.—th.

As the liquidator will not accept your [i.e., the lessors'] terms, and cannot be forced to do so, the matter must be dealt with on the footing of there being a subsisting lease. To such a case Hardy v. Fothergill has no application. I can therefore only allow a proof for the branches which have occurred up to the present time. . . . The principle of Haytor Granite Co., In re, and Horsey's Claim applies to the present case; and if the company is in beneficial occupation, I go further, and say that the lessors can enter a claim for the full rent.—p. 757.

ROMER, J.—Now, if in this case, as in that of the New Oriental Bank Corporation, . . . the lessors had refused to let the lease be given up and prove for the loss thereby sustained by them. I should have felt great difficulty in doing more than was done by the learned judge in that case, for a lessor cannot be compelled to come in and prove. But here the lessors offer to arrange with the liquidator to take a surrender of the lease, or to determine it, on terms of their being able to prove for the loss thereby sustained by them. This is clearly an arrangement which ought to be made by the liquidator. . . . I desire to add that, in my opinion, since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill, the old cases as to proof by a lessor to a company in liquidation have to be reconsidered, as was pointed out by Lindley, L.J. in Craig's Claim; and certainly it will be the duty of the Court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its . . . all cases like the present, where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss on the footing of the lease being determined or treated as determined.—p. 502.

WRIGHT, J.—The two decisions of Malins, V.-C. which were cited by the liquidator, turned upon a different Act [Companies Act, 1856], and related to companies limited by shares. Whether they are authorities on the construction of the Act of 1862, even as to companies limited by shares, it is not necessary to consider. *Lion, &c. Association v. CHITTY, J.—Now, apart from any authority on the matter, I should have said that there would be practically but little difficulty in any case where there is a winding-up, going on in putting an estimate on the liability of any contributory. . . . But it was said that Bacon, V.-C. has decided in Furdoojee's Case that future calls could not be fairly estimated. That case, however, was one which related to an Indian insolvency, and has been treated by some of the text-writers of great learning and authority as turning on that fact, and I am very much disposed to take that view of the case, and to think that that was all that was intended to be decided by Bacon, V.-C. who had not before him a section similar to that which I have to deal with—namely, sect. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. But there are some observations, no doubt, of the V-C which seem to show that, in his opinion, in that case, a fair estimate could not have been put on the amount of the liability. Speaking with the greatest respect for the V-C, if that was his opinion, it appears to me it would not be reconcilable with the decisions of the C. A., who have dealt with cases of far greater difficulty than the one which he had before him. It is sufficient to mention one case—that is, Neal, Ex parte, Butey, In re [(1880) 14 Ch. D. 579], where the C. A. put an estimate on an annuity which was agreed to be paid to a wife separated from her husband in the event of her being chaste, or cohabitation not being resumed, or the marriage not dissolved. These were contingencies which practical men, after all, could deal with, although what exact deduction ought to be made in respect of them might perhaps give rise to difficulty. But such difficulty did not appear to the C. A. to be insuperable.—p. 594.

GIFFARD, L.J. (for self and SELWYN, L.J.).—The M.R. founded his judgment for the most part on Martin's Patent Anchor Co. v. Morton. In the argument before us exceptions were taken both to the argument of the M.R. and of the learned judges of the Court of Q. B. in the Patent Anchor Co. v. Morton, and it was, among other arguments, urged that, taking the Bankruptcy Act and the Winding-up Act together, there was a distinct legislative enactment that calls under a winding-up should be proved and provable whether the bankruptcy occurred before or after the winding-up. As a ground for this the latter part of the 77th section of the Winding-up Act was much relied upon. . . . The argument on this section was, that as it applied in terms and words to an insolvency before the Act, it necessarily applied to a bankruptcy proceeding the winding-up; and the observations on the judgment of the M.R. and the judgments of the learned judges of the Court of Q. B. were to the effect that they were erroneous in attempting to escape the result of this conclusion by laying it down that proof might be made, provided it occurred before the assets under the bankruptcy were distributed and the estate wound up. We think there is great force in this argument.—p. 234.

GIFFARD, L.J.—I hold that the V-C, both as regards the facts, both of Castello's Case and of the present case, was perfectly accurate when he said that the winding-up fixes the status of the contributory. I have no doubt that his remarks were made with reference to Curtis's Case and cases of that class. The principle is quite simple: that a man who executes a transfer remains liable unless and until there is on the list a transferee who is legally liable to the company, and you take, for the purpose of ascertaining whether this is the case, the date of the winding-up.—p. 462.

FRY, J.—These sections to which I have referred are all consistent with the definition clause, and show that the whole scheme of the articles is this, that the holder of a policy is to be a member of the company, but that when he ceases to be the holder he is also to cease to be a member. Moreover, I find that James, L.J., when the articles were before him in Albion Life Assurance Society, In re, explained the articles consistently with this construction, saying that the clause making participating policy-holders members was, "only to give them control over the funds which would be applicable for their policies, and that those provisions did not seem to him sufficient to imply that the mutual liabilities were different from those in ordinary offices." It is clear that these remarks apply to persons who are interested, and not to persons who were once interested but are so no longer. . . . Then the liquidator says that Mr. Brown cannot be relieved until some other person is registered in his place, and Curtis's Case was cited to me. But that case did not depend upon the construction of such a special contract as there is in this case, and is no authority here. The question here is simply this—What is the contract between the parties? If the contract is on this footing, that the simply ceasing to hold the policy relieves the policy-holder from his liability, I must give effect to the contract. In Curtis's Case there was a provision of a different kind.—p. 644.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—It was most desirable that this case should be fully argued, regard being had to the decision of Giffard, L.J., in Accidental and Marine Insurance Corporation, In re. The point in that case was not exactly the same as that which we have now before us, but the observations made by the L.J. in his judgment, and the reasoning on which he relied, would be such as certainly to render a decision in this case, affirming the decision of the M.R., inconsistent with that of Giffard, L.J. . . . Now I confess that it does appear to me that the late Giffard, L.J., was in some degree led to an erroneous conclusion by supposing that the whole of the arrangements thus made under the Act of 1862 was of so general and arbitrary a character, and did so vary all the usual rights subsisting between the partners of a joint stock company inter se, and those between the company and the creditors, as to compel him to give to the Act an interpretation which seemed to follow most closely its literal wording, without any reference to what the past course of law had been in such cases.—p. 802.

SELBORNE, L.C.—These cases have been reheard before us by reason of the decision of the H. L. in Webb v. Whiffin. The points which may be regarded as settled by that decision are, first, that the liability of a past member of a company under sect. 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, is a liability to contribute to the general assets of the company in the event of its being wound up, and not a liability to contribute to a fund appropriated (so far as creditors are concerned) for the payment of any particular debts of the company; and, secondly, that the rights of creditors of the company, at whatever time their debts may have been contracted, are, as against the company and its assets (including all contributions made to its assets by past members), similar and equal, or, in other words, that such creditors are not divisible into classes with different rights against different funds; and, as a necessary consequence, that there is neither occasion nor room for any marshalling of assets between them. In one of the cases before us (Morris's Case) a different view of the law has been taken by the L.J.J., and in that respect the order in Morris's Case must of course now be altered so as to make it conformable to the judgment of the H. L. But there remain two other questions which it is necessary for us to determine—the one (a question arising both in Brett's Case and Morris's Case), whether when the assets of a company which is being wound up are insufficient to discharge its debts and liabilities and the costs of the winding-up, without recourse to past members, calls can be made on past members, in respect of debts or liabilities contracted by the company before they ceased to be members, to the same extent as if those debts or liabilities had not been reduced by any dividends paid thereon after the winding-up out of the property of the company, independently of calls, or by means of calls upon present members; the other (which arises in Brett's Case only), whether calls can be made upon past members in respect of any debt or liability of the company contracted before they ceased to be members, which has been released or extinguished between the date of the winding-up order and the time of making such calls, and which, therefore, cannot participate in any dividend which may be made out of the proceeds of such calls. Neither of these questions came before the H. L. for decision in Webb v. Whiffin, but observations bearing more or less upon them were made by four of the noble and learned lords who then advised the House, and some variety of opinion may be traced in those observations. Certain passages in the speeches of Lord Chelmsford and Lord Cairns have been relied upon before us as favouring the view, that the measure of the liability of a past member under sect. 38, so far as it depends upon the existence of debts of the company contracted before he ceased to be a member, ought to be determined solely by the amount of such debts as they stood at the commencement of the winding-up, without reference to any subsequent event by which that amount may have been reduced or even wholly extinguished. On the other hand, it seems clear that Lord Westbury and Lord Hatherley would have returned a negative answer to the first, and (Lord Hatherley at least) to the second also of the questions now requiring our decision. In this state of things it cannot be said that any binding or authoritative exposition of the law upon these points is derivable from the case of Webb v. Whiffin (p. 49). . . . My conclusion is that both in Morris's Case and in Brett's Case the liability of past members to contribute in respect of debts contracted before they ceased to be members could not exceed the amount of the "residuum" of those debts, to use Lord Westbury's expression, after writing off from them the full amount of the dividends paid out of the property in hand and the contributions of present members; and that in Brett's Case the entire claim as to all this residuum and as to all future dividends thereon having been in substance and effect released and discharged to the company, no call in respect of any such debt or liability could properly be made. In Brett's Case I agree in result in the original conclusions of the full C. A., and in Morris's Case with the original conclusion of the L.J.J. on both these points, though some of the reasons assigned by the learned judges at the original hearing have been displaced by the decision of the H. L. in Webb v. Whiffin.—p. 52. JAMES and MELLISH, L.J.J. agreed.

WILLES, J.—The question has not arisen for the first time, inasmuch as in Nevill's Case it presented itself to the minds of the L.J.J., one of whom [James, L.J.] decided it, whilst the other [Mellish, L.J.] impliedly did the same. As respects the remarks of the M.R. in Hudson's Case, it may be that the L.J.J. put the case of principal and surety, but the substance of the decision is that if one person be secondarily and another primarily liable for a debt in respect of property in the enjoyment of the latter, and the former has to pay, he is to be indemnified by the latter; and though it may not be the actual decision in the case, yet it was a substantial cause of the decision, and cannot be considered as extra-judicial. This being so, even if I doubted the correctness of the decision, I should feel bound to follow it; but as it is, I agree with and adopt it cheerfully.—p. 200. KEATING, J. concurred.

 SELWYN, L.J.—We have been much pressed with the authority of the judgment of Lord Cairns in Stocken's Case. It appears to me that that case has no application to the present. That was not with reference to a liability such as arises here. It was only a question whether certain unpaid calls at the date of the winding-up order could be enforced as against a person who had ceased to be a member.—p. 206.

GIFFARD, L.J.—I quite agree that the facts of this case are not identical with those of Bridger and Neill's Case, but though there is a distinction in fact, in principle there is none whatever. The difference between that case and the present is that there, although the shares had been forfeited, the parties whose names were sought to be placed upon the register were persons who had transferred their shares, and their transferees could not have been made to pay calls made on those shares, while in the present case the gentleman whose name is sought to be put on the list has simply had his shares forfeited; and there is, I agree, also a somewhat different clause of forfeiture in these articles from that in the other case. Bridger and Neill's Case proves that there need not be shares in existence in order that a past member may be made liable in respect of them. It also decides that the "amount in respect of which the member is liable," is the amount (if any) which has not been paid, and it further decides this, as plainly as a case can decide anything, that what you have to look to is the original contract of the shareholder in respect of the shares. Then you have to consider whether the shareholder has ceased to be a member for more than twelve months, then whether any other person is liable in respect of these particular shares, and, if so, you must exhaust him before you can come upon the past member; but if either those shares are transferred, and the person who is a member in respect of them is unable to pay, or if those other shares do not exist at all, then, beyond all question, after all the existing members have been exhausted, the past member is liable.—p. 126.

B. 871; 81 L. T. 300.—RIDLEY, J. ROMER, L.J.—As to the first point, the defendant's liability, in respect of which the claim in the action is made, is not as a contributory or as a past or present member of the company, but as a debtor to the company under the provisions of art. 140 of the articles of association. As long ago as 1867 it was pointed out by Romilly, M.R., in Needham's Case, that the liability of a former shareholder in a company which arises in respect of calls owing upon shares at the time of a forfeiture of the shares is not in any sense a liability which arises as a contributory. As to the second point, all I can say is, that if sect. 15 [Companies Act, 1867] is to have any effect it ought to have effect in this case. National Debenture and Assets Corporation, In re (supra, col. 385), is distinguishable. If we had to consider that case we might have to say whether the dicta there could be justified.—p. 708.

JESSEL, M.R.—That ought to conclude the question, and would conclude it were it not that there is London Marine Insurance Association, In re. It is said, and I agree, that that case was in many respects similar to this, and debts of outside creditors had been proved against the association, which was being wound up. The V.-C. is reported to have said, "with respect to these"—that is debts due to the outside creditors—"if any such debt was contracted, it is not a debt due from the association as such." If it were not, it could not be proved at all. It would be a ground for expunging the proof. But his honour's attention does not seem to have been directed to the fact that it was proved and not expunged, and there being no attempt to expunge it he was bound by the certificate as if it were a debt of the association as far as he was concerned. He continues, "It is not a debt due from any member of the association, and every member is in the same position in that respect as a member of a club." Then he goes into the question with reference to clubs. In my opinion this association cannot be treated in the same way as an ordinary club for social purposes, the constitution of which is familiar in London. But that does not go to this point. The V.-C. decided that, in his opinion, the outside creditors were not creditors either of the association as such, or of any member of it. All I can say is, the learned judge appears there to have forgotten that he had nothing to decide. The certificate had decided that these debts were debts of the association; and in face of that certificate he had no right, as it appears to me, to say they were not debts of the association. It might have been a very good ground for asking on behalf of some of the contributories to expunge those debts, if the argument were well founded; but the debts standing and having, as in this case, stood for years unexpunged, and having so stood until the opportunity was given to the contributories to go over the list of debts and elect what they would seek to expunge, and what they would not, it appears to me impossible to allow them to say that these debts have not been properly proved; at all events, that is not the object of the application before me. I consider I am bound by what has taken place. I consider these debts to be debts of the association, and that, therefore, every contributor, whose name is on the list of contributors, is liable to pay them, and they must be included in the call.—p. 348.

COTTON, L.J.—General International Agency Co., In re, was referred to, and it is said that there the Court gave leave to serve something—but what? It was only a notice that an application was going to be made for an order for a call. It only amounted to a notice that unless cause was shown to the contrary an order would be made for a call. The L.J., according to the report, said that the making of the call could only be the foundation of proceedings in the Courts of law abroad to compel payment of the call when made, and in those proceedings the question might be raised whether the service so effected was good or not; but if it was, they were of opinion that service by post would be sufficient. That is very different from the present case.—p. 351.

COTTON, L.J.—There it was sought to serve on persons residing out of the jurisdiction an order for a call, with a view to found proceedings against them to compel payment, and it was held that the Court had no jurisdiction to order such service. In the present case the notice is not intended to be the foundation of any proceedings against the persons on whom it is served. The official liquidator is only performing a duty cast upon him by the Companies Acts of giving certain information to persons whom it is proposed to place on the list of contributories. . . . It is merely a notice that they will be placed on the list unless they show cause to the contrary, and is quite of a different nature from the notice in Anglo-African Steamship Co., In re.—p. 2. SELWYN, L.J.—The case is, I believe, unaffected by any other decision, for the cases which were referred to—Kellock's Case and Xeres Wine Co., In re—relate to an entirely different point, and the effect of the decision in those cases is only this, that the right of a creditor having a mortgage security to proceed upon all his remedies at once was not taken away from him by any of the provisions of the Companies Act.—p. 713.

Here the company are in fact mortgagages. HATHERLEY, L.G.—It was argued by Mr. Jessel that the rule laid down in Kellock's Case, in cases of winding-up, is not the rule in bankruptcy. But that case turned on a principle of a different kind, namely, that there was nothing in the Companies Act which intercepted the original contract existing between the debtor and his creditor, namely, that he was to have the security of the personal estate of the debtor, and at the same time the full security of the mortgage; and therefore the Court would not deprive the creditor of his rights by following the analogy of the practice in bankruptcy, where the position of the creditor was governed by the express enactments of the Bankruptcy Act.—p. 115.

JESSEL, M.R.—But it was said that my decision in Albion Steel and Wire Co., In re, was in effect a decision the other way. I do not think so; at all events it was not intended by me to be so. If the words "secured creditors" are to include a man who gets a security by virtue of the Rules in Bankruptcy, as, for instance, under the 32nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, then my decision in that case would have been contrary to what I now decide; what I meant to say was that a "secured creditor" is a creditor who has a security as against the company itself. In no sense could a man who acquired his security for the first time under the law of bankruptcy be said to be a secured creditor of the bankrupt, because after bankruptcy it is to the property of the bankrupt, and not to the bankrupt himself that he must look. In the case of the Albion Steel and Wire Co. the creditor never had any security as against the company. I make these observations on that case as I see that view is not there so clearly expressed as it might have been.—p. 539.

HALL, V.-C.—The case is, I think, governed by that of Coal Consumers' Association, In re. The decision there I am, I consider, bound to follow until there be a subsequent case which treats that as not law. The M.R., in Albion Steel and Wire Co., In re, refers to that case with approval. It was submitted that the M.R. had qualified his judgment in Albion Steel and Wire Co., In re, by his judgment in Printing and Numerical Registering Co., In re, but his lordship has in the latter case merely explained what he thought was not in his former judgment, i.e., what he thought might be misleading in regard to secured creditors, but he did not say anything which intimated directly or indirectly that the case approved of by him, and which was decided by Malins, V.-C., was not sound law and ought not to be followed.—p. 186.

JAMES, L.J.—Since the Court rose on Saturday I have considered this case, and see no reason to differ from the decision of the V.-C. [Malins], who followed the opinion of Fry, J. in Richards & Co., In re, dissenting from that of the M.R. in Printing, &c. Registering Co. It appears to me, with deference to the M.R., that there is a fallacy in his argument. . . . The M.R. thinks that this enactment [Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10] involves the proposition that, whereas under certain circumstances a security is avoided in bankruptcy, therefore, in the administration of the assets of a deceased person and in the winding up of a company, a security is to be avoided under similar circumstances. There are, to my mind, no words in the section which, expressly or by implication, lead to that result. The question is not as to the administration of a fund, but what is the fund to be administered. —p. 340.

MALINS, V.-C.—As to authority there is no case exactly in point, except in Norton Ironworks Co., In re, and that is distinctly in favour of the claim. The M.R. had the point distinctly before him, and if the Act applies to one class it applies to all. Albion, &c. Co., In re was only two months later, and his lordship’s attention does not seem to have been called to the former case, and his decision seems quite inconsistent with it. Then came Printing, &c. Co., In re, in which he had to discuss Albion, &c. Co., In re, and he seems to have doubted whether it was right. Therefore, so far as there is authority, I must consider that the M.R. has taken my view. —p. 375.

COTTON, L.J.—It is clear to my mind that this [i.e., Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44, sub-s. iii.] was not made applicable to the winding up of a company by sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and so it was decided by the late M.R., Sir G. Jessel, in Crumlin Viaduct Works, In re, and the same principle was acted on by the C. A. in Withernsea

Brickworks, In re. . . . That case did not decide the precise point in this case, because the question there related to the rights of an execution creditor, but it shows that in the opinion of the Court the 10th section could not affect cases where the question was whether the property belonged to the company or to somebody else.—p. 134.

BRETT, L.J.—In that case [Railway Steel and Plant Co. &c. parte, (supra, col. 579)] the V.-C. found as a matter of fact that the creditor had been requested by the company to postpone his action, and had accordingly postponed it, and that the assets of the company were sufficient to pay all its debts in full. No such facts are established here, so that case does not apply, and I decline to give any opinion whether the decision on those facts was right. In Richards & Co., In re, the creditor had delayed his proceedings on the faith of a promise by the company that they would not present a winding-up petition, and a petition was presented which was found as a matter of fact to have been in reality presented on behalf of the company. I give no opinion whether that case was rightly decided, but right or wrong it does not govern the present where the facts are quite different.—p. 449.

SELBORNE, L.C.—I think it right, rather in consequence of what was said by the Court of C. P. in Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling, than for any other reason, to observe that I entertain no doubt whatever that Grissell's Case was decided on the soundest principles. . . . As the case in the C. P. substantially is not before us, I think it wiser and better not to say more on the subject than this—that although recognising the soundness of Grissell's Case, when the winding up is by the Court, or voluntarily under the supervision of the Court, and professing not to depart from it, the Court of C. P. has thought it inapplicable to a case of voluntary liquidation where the Court has not intervened, and in order to arrive at that conclusion, has certainly shaken, by some of the observations made, a portion of the foundation for the conclusion in Grissell's Case. I mean that part which relates to the 133rd section, which will be found in Lord Chelmsford's judgment—the Court of C. P., apparently thinking that when you deal with a voluntary liquidation under the Act, it is merely a question in which the shareholders are concerned. Whenever that subject shall require to be reviewed and further considered I hope attention will be paid to various sections in the Act to which, as far as I can see, attention was not particularly directed on that occasion.—p. 408. MELLISH, L.J. concurred.

JAMES, L.J.—I desire to be distinctly understood as saying that I concur in the doubts which the L.C. has expressed whether the decision in the case in the C. P. can be reconciled with Grissell's Case.—p. 410.

JESSEL, M.R.—The principle in Grissell's Case appears to me to cover the case of a voluntary winding up as much as that of a compulsory winding up. The next case in order of date was Calisher's Case, which was decided a few days before the case before the Court of C. P., and there Lord Romilly decided that you could not set off a debt due from the company to the contributory in the absence of special agreement. That latter portion of the decision has been overruled, and it has been held that you cannot do so even by special agreement. But, subject to that, so far as the case before the Court went, Lord Romilly decided most distinctly that the Court could not, having regard to the terms of sect. 101, and the decision of Lord Chelmsford in Grissell's Case, allow a contributory to set off a debt against a call. . . . The whole of the judgments of the full Court of C. P. [Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling] proceed, as I said before, on the assumption that the Statute of Set-off applies unless the other side can show a negative. I think if you examine the Act you can show the negative, but I do not think it is necessary to show the negative. I should have gone into this matter more fully had it not been for the elaborate discussion which the matter received from Lord Selborne in Black & Co.'s Case. That was the case in which the Court overruled the distinction which Lord Romilly thought might exist of a special contract, but in the course of it there is an elaborate discussion by Lord Selborne of Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling, and he so clearly points out his reasons that it would be a work of supererogation on my part to repeat what he has indicated; and I need hardly say I entirely agree with what he says on the subject. . . . There is only one observation of the V.-C. in that case [Gibbs and West's Case] to which it is necessary for me to refer. After discussing the decision in Grissell's Case, he refers to Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling. He says, "I have been referred to Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling, with regard to which I confess, after all that has been said upon it, and after all that learned judges have said, I am unable to see that it is not in conflict with Grissell's Case, which has settled that, where the liability is limited, the right to set-off cannot exist." I merely cite that to show that at least one other judge has considered that there is a direct conflict between the authorities; but I am not by citing that case to be supposed to agree with the decision in other respects. Indeed, the observations I have made show that I could not agree with it. I cite it merely with reference to that observation.—pp. 603—605.

WRIGHT, J.—Here the creditor contributory is not a bankrupt individual, but is a company in liquidation, and therefore the particular ground on which Duckworth, in re, was decided is not applicable. . . . It is true that in Gill's Case the creditor contributory was not a company in liquidation, but that circumstance does not prevent it from being in point as a decision that the bankruptcy law of set-off is not imported by the Judicature Act into the law of companies so as to allow a set-off against calls. . . . Duckworth, in re, therefore has no application. . . . I think there is some difficulty in reconciling Duckworth, in re, with what Lord Selborne said in Black & Co.'s Case (supra, col. 605) with reference to a "statutory trustee," but I do not suppose the H. ESHER, M.R.—I apprehend that the true distinction between that case [Price, Ex parte] and the present one is that pointed out in Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., in re—namely, that there was no action at all, and that the Court was only dealing with the rights of proof in bankruptcy. It is not necessary to consider what would have been the rights of the defendant if there had been no action, and if the proceedings had only been in bankruptcy; but the question is, what are his rights in this action in which the amount of his set-off is large enough to bar the company's claim altogether? This view of the case is in accordance with the decision in Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., in re, and is not contrary to that in Price, Ex parte.—p. 23.

BACON, C.J.—My decision in Boyle, Ex parte, was founded on another principle, viz., that the trustee in a liquidation stands in a fiduciary relation. He is entrusted with very large powers and must use them justly. In that case it appeared that the trustee had not discharged his duty properly. There was no shadow of a reason why he should not have discharged his duty by satisfying himself that the debtor had rendered all the assistance in his power in realising the estate, and therefore I ordered the registrar to give the certificate.—p. 703.

 JESSEL, M.R.—Now, what is the meaning of the words "undue cause shown" in the Companies Act, 1862, s. 141? I am not prepared altogether to adopt the view of Malins, V.-C. in *British Nation, &c.  COTTON, L.J.—I do not think that the late M.R., in Sir John Moore, &c. Co., in re, which has been quoted, intended to give an exhaustive definition of "due cause" or to confine it to that particular matter—namely, personal unfitness. In fact, he points out that, and what he says is this, "I should say that as a general rule it points to some general unfitness of the person, it may be from personal character, or from his connection with other parties, or the circumstances in which he is mixed up—some unfitness in the wide sense of the term." He does not intend to exhaust all the grounds; but, in my opinion—and I believe the rest of the Court agree with me—if the Court is satisfied on the evidence before them that it is against the interest of the liquidation, by which I mean all those who are interested in the company in liquidation, that a particular person should remain liquidator, then the Court has power to remove the present liquidator, and, of course, then to appoint some other person in his place.—p. 129.

 SELWYN, L.J. (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE, GIFFARD, L.J. and SIR L. PEEL).—The authority of Totty, Ex parte, has been much pressed upon the consideration of their lordships, but the real ground of the decision in that case is explained in the marginal note of the case, which states that "A company was being wound up compulsorily, after an abortive attempt had been made to wind it up voluntarily, and the official liquidators agreed with thirty-five shareholders to compromise their liabilities for a fixed sum, those shareholders insisting as a condition that the data upon which the compromise was founded should not be divulged. The compromise was sworn to be founded upon details of property and circumstances, which if made known would operate detrimentally to the thirty-five shareholders and to the interests of the company. The official liquidators applied to the Court to sanction the compromise under that condition, in pursuance of sect. 19 of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 60, some of the creditors opposed on the ground of the data not being stated, and the application was refused with costs;" and on appeal the decision was affirmed. But in that case there was no question as to the liability of the thirty-five shareholders: the question was as to the amount which was likely to be recovered from those thirty-five shareholders, and that, of course, was the question which the Court had to decide when it came to consider whether such a compromise was advisable or not; and the grounds upon which that question was to be determined were, from the very terms of the compromise itself, to be kept secret. The mere statement of these facts is sufficient to distinguish that case from the present, in which there are two very different questions; first, whether those persons who are alleged to be contributories are contributories at all? and secondly, whether, assuming them to be fixed upon the list of contributories, they would be able to pay any, and if any what, proportion of the amount of the calls which might be made upon them.—p. 501.

MALINS, V.-C. said . . . that that decision [Stearic Acid Co., in re] did not commit itself to his judgment so strongly as the decisions of Kindersley, V.-C. generally did, "because, in his opinion as a company could not be wound up voluntarily without the appointment of liquidators, a notice of the intention to wind up voluntarily involved a notice of the intention to appoint liquidators. He therefore could not concur in that decision, and he was supported in his view by Lord Chelmsford, who in his judgment in the Overend Gurney Case, Oakes v. Turquand [supra, col. 504], after referring to sect. 133 of the Companies Act, said, "The necessary consequence of a voluntary winding up being the appointment of liquidators, I am disposed to think that they may be appointed at the same general meeting at which the resolution for voluntary winding up is passed, without special notice." Inasmuch as this particular question had not to be decided in that case it was not necessary to give an actual decision upon it, but as Stearie Acid Co., In re, had been cited, if the H. JAMES, L.J.—Now that we have the resolutions before us upon which the judgment of the L.J.J. proceeded in Birmingham Banking Co., Ex parte, I am unable really to make any substantial distinction between that case and this. . . . I cannot, therefore, distinguish the 7,500*l.* in this case from the 16,500*l.* as to which there has been a positive decision of the L.J.J., that it was not within the competency of one liquidator to accept the bills as being a merely ministerial act. It is also to be observed that there was no actual decision of the Court that the act of one liquidator under any circumstances would be sufficient. It was not necessary to decide the point in that case. I must confess I do not consider it is a decision that the acceptance of the bills can be delegated to one liquidator when the Act of Parliament says that the thing ought to be done by the two.—p. 209.

[It was said in argument: Lord Hatherley (at p. 32) expresses it as his opinion, though he does not actually decide the point, that the liquidator, being bound to collect all the assets of the company, and distribute them amongst the creditors, is in a position in which he may assert rights as against the company, and assume a position against its members which the company itself possibly might not be in a position to assert.]

JESSEL, M.R.—My view of the Act [of 1862] certainly agrees with that of Lord Hatherley. It seems to me that the powers of the liquidator are more extensive than those of the company. For instance, under sect. 78 he can make a member of the company pay what the company itself could never have made him pay; for he can enforce contributions from the member which the company could not have enforced.—p. 123.

JAMES, L.J.—It is impossible to read that decision [Massey, Ex parte], without seeing that really it decided that which Bacon, V.-C. afterwards [Trueman, In re] held that it decided, namely, that credit in these cases is given to the assets of the company; that is to say, that the official liquidator is only the agent or person acting for the company. In a voluntary winding up the liquidator is appointed by the company itself to act as their agent. In a compulsory winding up he is appointed by the Court to act for the company; and that seems to be good sense, and has been so settled.—p. 133.

MELLISH, L.J. to the same effect. BAGGALLAY, J.A. concurred.

BRETT, J.—Then it is argued that there is a decision of the C. A. in Chancery which is inconsistent with that view [that there is no personal liability on the part of the official liquidator to the solicitor], Grand Trunk, &c. Ry. v. Brodie, where an order was made that the official liquidator should be personally liable to pay the costs of the opposite party, because he had appealed without, as the Court thought, sufficient grounds. . . . In the case cited there was no pretence for a contract; it was an order of the Court against a litigating party for having improperly instituted that litigation.—p. 136.

BOHER, J.—In the first case [Oriental Inland Steam Co., In re (supra, col. 576)], James, L.J. used the expression "trust property"; but that was with reference to the case then before the Court; and in my opinion the judge who used that phrase was using it in order to point out that the property of the company had ceased to belong beneficially to the company after it had been wound up. There is also the phrase in that case as to the liquidator holding the assets fixed by the Act of Parliament with a trust for equal distribution amongst the creditors, and that sect. 95 of the Act of 1862 constitutes "a trust for the benefit of all the creditors." That again is used in a general sense, and no doubt correctly, as showing that the liquidator held the assets with certain obligations resting on him; but those expressions were obviously not intended to apply to a case like this, and the learned judges were not in my opinion intending to describe the liquidator of a company as a trustee for each creditor or contributory of the company. In Black & Co.'s Case the expression used is that the liquidator is "a statutory trustee." That phrase again was, I think, used not in the sense in which the plaintiff seeks to use it here, but with reference to a question concerning the powers of a company and its directors as distinguished from the powers of a liquidator, and I take it as pointing out what the duty of the liquidator was. In London and Caledonian, &c. Co., In re (supra, col 554), James, L.J., in pointing out that possibly a creditor who had not been paid his debt might have his remedy against the liquidator personally, confined his observations to a case where the liquidator had acted "knowingly and wilfully," or to a case where he had been guilty of bad faith or gross or personal misconduct. In my view a voluntary liquidator is more rightly described as the agent of the company—an agent who has, no doubt, cast upon him by statute and otherwise special duties, amongst which may be mentioned the duty of applying the company's assets in paying creditors and distributing the surplus among the shareholders. James, L.J. referred to this as being his true position in Anglo-Moravian, &c. Ry., In re.—p. 722.

JAMES, L.J. (for self and MELLISH, L.J.J.)—Our attention has, however, been called to the language of the L.J.J. in a case relating to this very company, who, in their observations refer to the liquidator as being in a position analogous to the secretary or other public officer of a corporation made a defendant for the purposes of discovery, and who is compellable to make the same discovery as a defendant proper would be. The point which actually arose in that case was whether an official liquidator, examined as a witness, could protect himself from answering, and it was held that he could not. We see no reason to dissent from that decision, nor from the reasons or observations of our predecessors when rightly applied to the proper kind of case. Among the other duties of an official liquidator it may fall to him to represent the company as a party litigant. The company can only sue or be sued through him, and where there is such a suit, or where there is in the winding-up a proceeding which is in substance, though not in form, a bill or action by or against the company, there, from the very necessity of the case, the adverse party has a right to deal with the official liquidator as the litigant, and to obtain from him the same measure of discovery in the same manner as he would from any other litigant. That is the principle of that case, and that principle sufficiently indicates the limits of its application.—p. 840.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The summons in this case was taken out by the appellants, not by the liquidator. Under such circumstances it is clear that the appellants are only entitled to costs out of the assets of the company. Kekewich, J. appears to have thought, in the similar case of Staffordshire Gas and Coke Co., In re, that the practice was the other way, and that an order ought to be made against the liquidator personally; but that is not so unless the liquidator has done something to make himself personally liable for the costs.—p. 285. A. L. SMITH, L.J. concurred.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—It was at one time contended that the terms of the Companies Act, 1862, were such that a successful litigant in proceedings with the liquidator, or with the company through its liquidators, or with the company after liquidation had begun, must come in and prove in respect of his claim pari passu with the creditors of the company who were such at the date of the order for winding up. But that contention was disposed of by Malins, V.-C. in Home Investment Society, In re. . . Lord Cairns, in Smith, Ex parte (which Mr. Cross says has been misunderstood), decided at least this, that a successful litigant in proceedings commenced after the winding-up order has a right to be paid in priority to the general costs of the liquidation. To my mind that is laid down in the plainest possible manner by Lord Cairns, and subsequent cases recognise that he did so. The proposition that a successful litigant is entitled to be paid in priority to the general costs of the liquidation was affirmed in Home Investment Society, In re, and also in Dominion of Canada Plumbago Co., In re—certainly by Pearson, J. and as I read it by the C. A. also. . . . When once a person is in a position to say, "I am entitled to rank on this fund," that is to say, the assets available for the purposes of liquidation, he and all other persons in the same position must be dealt with on a footing of equality irrespective of the dates of their judgments. The obtaining of the order for costs creates no sort of a charge on the assets, but I cannot see that Cape Breton Co. v. Fenn decides more than that. . . . The remarks of Sir G. Jessel in that case only show that when there is an insolvent fund, and various claimants have obtained orders for costs entitling them to rank on that fund, such persons obtain no charge on the fund, and the dates of the orders give no priority. The liquidator seeks to treat that case as a decision that a successful litigant who gets an order for costs is not entitled to payment until the liquidation has been completed, so that provision may be made for the whole costs of the liquidation, including contingent debts, and fresh debts incurred of the character of those to which priority is given under r. 31 of the Rules of 1890, or the general practice of the Chancery Division. I do not understand the case to decide anything of the kind, and I am not going to hold that the right to payment is postponed until all possible claims, contingent or otherwise, in the winding-up have come in. . . . It is said that Lord Romilly decided in Perceival, Ex parte, that the litigant was not entitled to immediate payment, and that no order for payment to him could be made while the liquidator's remuneration remained unpaid, and it seems to me that he did so decide. But I cannot agree that that decision was recognised as correct by the C. A. in Dominion of Canada Plumbago Co., In re. When that case was before Pearson, J. he said in terms that the litigant was entitled to be paid forthwith, and that means, of course, in conjunction with others in the same position, and subject to abatement in case of deficiency. But it is said that the L.J.J. went on a different principle and followed Perceival, Ex parte. It seems to me that they did nothing of the kind. The order made in Dominion of Canada Plumbago Co., In re, was that the liquidator should pay Kirby, who was the litigant, the taxed costs of his litigation, and should be at liberty to retain the amount out of the assets of the company. . . . The decision there [Smallpage's and Brandon's Cases] was as to the circumstances under which a liquidator ought to be ordered personally to pay the costs of proceedings in which he has been unsuccessful, and has nothing to do with the question raised in the present case. . . . I might be thought wanting in respect for the Irish Court if I did not refer to Clitheroe, Ex parte. The final words of the judgment in that case are as follows: "I do not, however, think that they are entitled to an order for immediate payment, as this might possibly interfere with the rights of other persons; and Perceival, Ex parte, and Dunson's Estate Fireclay Co., In re (supra, col. 578), are authorities against making such an order." Those words seem to support the contention of the liquidator in the present case; but the Irish case is perhaps the only direct authority in his favour, unless Perceival, Ex parte, is one. In Clitheroe, Ex parte, however, the Court was dealing with a very different case from this. The company was being wound up under the supervision of the Court, and the landlords of property held by the company, without obtaining the leave of the Court, brought an action to recover possession, and obtained judgment. Under these circumstances it was held that they could not have an order for immediate payment of their taxed costs. The decision does not seem to me to accord with the current of authority in this country—pp. 768—770.

COTTENHAM, L.C.—The case of Gordon v. Gordon is entitled to the highest consideration; because it is a case which Lord Eldon decided; and Lord Eldon's observations, as reported, would imply that he doubted, at least, whether it might not have been better to have decided upon the other parts of the case before the expense was incurred of an issue as to whether the plaintiff was heir-at-law or not. I cannot but feel very considerable doubt whether these expressions did fall from Lord Eldon at least, without some qualification, which is not to be found in the report; because when the facts of that case are considered (and I very well remember the case in the Court of Chancery), it is clear that the Court could not deal with the question without knowing who was the heir-at-law. That was a contest between two brothers for the family estates; it related to the legitimacy of the elder one, the younger brother claiming, because he alleged the elder brother was illegitimate. In that contest the parties came to an arrangement between themselves, by which they agreed upon a certain division of the property. It afterwards appeared that the younger brother, at the time he got his elder brother to enter into this compromise upon the supposed doubt whether the marriage of their parents had taken place anterior to the birth of the eldest son, was in possession of evidence of the marriage; and that he, therefore, had induced his brother to part with this property, to which the elder brother was clearly entitled, upon the supposition of there being a doubt as to the marriage, when, in point of fact, he was in possession of evidence to prove it. The elder brother discovering this, filed his bill to be released from that arrangement, upon the ground that the younger brother had practised a fraud upon him, and ultimately he succeeded. But how could that question have been decided between the parties without the fact being known whether the elder brother was legitimate or illegitimate? The whole foundation of the charge was, that his younger brother knew it, and concealed the fact from him when he got him to come into the arrangement. It is impossible, therefore, that Lord Eldon could have meant this: that the Court had decided whether the arrangement was fraudulent or not, without first ascertaining the fact upon which the existence of the alleged fraud rested.—p. 200.

STUART, V.-C.—In Mitchel v. Reynolds, Parker, C.J. has classified such conditions as these. He said, "All the instances of conditions against law in a proper sense are reducible under one of these heads: First, either to do something that is malum in se, or malum prohibitum. Secondly, to omit the doing of something which is a duty. Thirdly, to encourage such crimes and omissions. Such conditions as these the law will always, and without any regard to circumstances, defeat; being concerned to remove all temptations and inducements to those crimes."—p. 244.

SIR J. COLVILLE (for self, SIR B. PEACOCK, SIR M. SMITH and SIR R. COLLIER).—There are undoubtedly dicta and even decisions in some of the earlier cases to the effect that conditions of this kind [that a legatee disputing the will

should be deprived of its benefits] were to be held to be in terrorem only, and, in the language of the Touchstone, "against the liberty of the law." But in the case of personal legacies, effect was given to the condition if there was a gift over on the breach of the condition. The whole law on this subject appears to their lordships to have been considered and put upon a sound foundation by the Court of Ex. in Cooke v. Turner, upon the case sent to them by the Court of Ch. It was suggested at the bar that that ruling was not acted upon by the Court of Ch. in the particular case. But, from the report of that case in the 15th volume of Simons' Reports, it appears that, though pressed to send the case before another Court of law, the V.-C. of England declined to do so, but directed, in the interest of the unborn issue of a marriage, an issue so framed as not to involve the forfeiture by the legatees of their legacy under the clause assumed to be valid. Dickson, Ex parte, which was decided by Lord Cranworth as V.-C. after his judgment in Cooke v. Turner, is supposed to conflict with the latter. But it does not really do so. No doubt the learned judge says of such conditions as the present, that they had been "considered (whether justly or not it is unnecessary to inquire) as contrary to the policy of the law." But he was not in any way called upon to decide that question: he was dealing with a condition of a very different kind, to which he gave effect. The real effect of his judgment is only that, if the condition be conditio rei licite, it ought to be enforced. It does not affect the authority of Cooke v. Turner. —p. 68.

COTTON, L.J. — In Tennant v. Brais, upon the fair construction of the words, the gift was a gift upon condition, not a limited gift. A sum was to be paid once for all if a woman was divorced; there was nothing imposing a limit on the duration of the gift. In Brown v. Peck the report is not clear either as regards the facts or the principle laid down. The testator, after noting that his niece had married without the consent of her mother, directed that if she lived with her husband his executors should pay her 2l. per month and no more, but if she lived from him and with her mother, then they should allow her 5l. per month. Lord Henley treated this as a condition, for he says, "the condition annexed being both impossible at the time of imposing it and contra bonos mores, the legacy was simple and pure." What was meant by "impossible" it is hard to say; but that is not material. All that is of importance is that it was treated as a condition, and the words could reasonably be so construed. Wren v. Bradley occasions more difficulty. There was first a gift of an annuity to the testator's daughter, subject to conditions which were contra bonos mores. Then there was a gift of the income of one-third of an accumulated fund to the same daughter "during such time as she shall continue to live apart from her husband, Abraham Wren;" and then came a condition in the form of a subsequent condition, that if she should at any time cohabit with her husband, then "during such time as she should cohabit with him" the income should be paid to other persons. It was proved that at the date of the will she was living apart from her husband. The V.-C. appears to have been impressed by that, and to have looked at the gift of the income as an immediate gift of it to the wife, subject to a proviso that if she returned to cohabitation the trust for payment to her should cease. I think this was the real ground of his decision, though he does not clearly state his reasons. . . . If that construction of the will be adopted as correct, there is no difficulty about the decision, for as to the annuity, the rule of the civil law clearly applied. — p. 938.

NORTH, J., after referring to this case, and pointing out that the report in the Law Journal contained facts not in the other report, said: That seems to differ from the present case in various respects. In the first place, I do not see my way to construe this will as the V.-C. construed the will in that case, because I should have to say that the condition imposed on the next-of-kin of establishing their rights within a year was of no importance, and I cannot see how that requirement can be got rid of by any judgment for the administration of the estate. In the next place there is this difference. The learned judge proceeded on the fact that a general decree had been made for the administration of the estate. That is not the case here. The parties have taken advantage of a mode of proceeding which enables them to do without a general administration decree, and have adopted proceedings by which the Court can deal with questions which arise in administering the trusts of the will without administering the trusts generally. Therefore, whatever the effect of a general administration decree would have been, it has no application in the present case. — p. 566.

KAY, J.—The words "conditional limitation" seem to be used in that case not in the sense in which Fearne and Butler employ them, but rather to describe an estate upon which a contingent remainder might be limited. According to the illustration which I have given from the definition by Fearne (Contingent Remainders, 10th ed., p. 15), the limitation in Machu, In re, would be in a deed a conditional limitation defeating a fee-simple, and in a will an executory devise.—

TURNER, L.J. (after discussing Gulliver v. Vaux and other cases) said—In the argument of this case, great reliance was placed, on the part of the defendants, on Doe v. Glover, but in that case the Court seems to me to have proceeded upon the ground, that the devise over was not repugnant to or inconsistent with the prior devise, and the Court, therefore, certainly did not intend to disturb the previous authorities or the principle on which they proceeded. The devise was there a devise in fee, and in case the devisees should not have parted with or disposed of the same, then over. The Court was of opinion that he could not, under that, dispose of it by will,
but that the testator meant, unless there was a parting with or disposition of the estate by deed in the lifetime of the first devisee, the devisees over would take, and the executory devise over to them would be good. I may observe, too, that the attention of the Court seems hardly to have been drawn to the point, that the devise over, as it was construed, took away the testamentary power which was incident to the fee first devised. Not one word seems to have fallen from the Court or from counsel in the course of the argument as to the effect of that decision being to contravene the rule of law by which every devise in fee has a testamentary power.

But it is plain on looking at the cases, that if a man says the estate shall go over if you do not dispose of it by deed; he says, you shall not have that power which the law gives of disposition by will. That point seems not to have been drawn to the attention of the Court, and, I will venture to add, that, if Doe v. Glover is to be considered as conflicting with the other authorities, I think that the other authorities, and especially Gulliver v. Vaux, ought to prevail against it.—p. 165.

JESSEL, M.R.—I must consider that case, recognising, as it does, those older authorities as being good law, to have proceeded on the particular wording of that will, and more especially on the latter clause. I do not say that the clause does have the same effect on my mind that it had upon the mind of my pre-

of construction, when you come to the conclusion that the judge is intending not to lay down a new rule of law, but is simply construing the particular instrument before him. Therefore I consider that Attwater v. Attwater does not affect the law of the case.—p. 445.

PEARSON, J. (after discussing Maseham v. Bluet, Daniel v. Ubley, and Doe v. Pearson, continued).—In Attwater v. Attwater, no doubt, Lord Romilly challenged the correctness of the decision in Doe v. Pearson. In Macleay, In re, Jessel, M.R., thought that, as Doe v. Pearson was decided in the year 1805, it was too late to go contrary to it, and, having in Macleay, In re, a devise which was very similar to that in Doe v. Pearson, he followed what he conceived to be the rule in Doe v. Pearson, and decided that the condition in Maclean, In re, was a valid condition. If there were nothing else in Maclean, In re, I do not think I need have discussed it any further, because the condition with which I have now to deal is not like the conditions in any one of the cases to which I have referred. But, no doubt, there are some observations of the M.R. in Maclean, In re, which were very strongly and very properly relied upon by Mr. Barber, because the authority of Sir G. Jessel is very great. I cannot possibly ignore those observations, and I feel bound to take exception to them, for I cannot agree with the propositions which they lay down. After citing those sections from Littleton to which I first referred (sects. 360—362), and also referring to Muschamp v. Bluet, Jessel, M.R., says: "So that, according to the old books, Sheppard's Touchstone being to the same effect, the test is whether the condition takes away the whole power of alienation substantially; it is a question of substance and not of mere form." I apprehend that the meaning of the word "substantially" is this: Does it really deprive the devise of the power of alienation, or does it only so restrain it that in effect he still has the power of alienation? If the latter it is good. The M.R. continues: "Now, you may restrict alienation in many ways. You may restrict alienation by prohibiting a particular class of alienation, or you may restrict alienation by prohibiting it to a particular class of individuals, or you may restrict alienation by restricting it to a particular time. In all those ways you may limit it, and it appears to me that in two ways, at all events, this condition is limited. First, it is limited as to the mode of alienation, because the only prohibition is against selling. There are various modes of alienation besides sale; a person may lease, or he may mortgage, or he may settle; therefore it is a mere limited restriction on alienation in that way. Then again, it is limited as regards class; he is never to sell it out of the family, but he may sell it to any one member of the family. It is not, therefore, limited in the sense of there being only one person to buy; the will shows there were a great many members of the family when she made her will; a great many are named in it; therefore you have a class which probably was large, and was certainly not small. Then it is not, strictly speaking, limited as to time, except in this way, that it is limited to the life of the first tenant in tail; of course, if unlimited as to time, it would be void for remoteness under another rule. So that this is strictly a limited restraint on alienation, and unless Coke upon Littleton has been overruled, or is not good law, this is a good condition." With all deference to Sir G. Jessel, I do not find in Coke upon Littleton that which he seems to have found, and I must say this, that when you refer to Coke upon Littleton, with all deference to that learned judge, we must bear in mind that he was not always consistent with himself. I find, for instance, this (Co. Litt. 223 b): "And yet if a man make a gift in tail, upon condition that he shall not make a lease for his own life, albeit the estate be lawful, yet the condition is good, because the reversion is in the donor." When, however, I turn to Sir Anthony Mildmay's Case (1606) 6 Co. Rep. 43 a I find this: "So if a man makes a gift in tail, on condition that he shall not make a lease for his own life, it is void and repugnant." I find also this (Co. Litt. 223 b): "If a man make a gift in tail, upon condition that he shall not make a lease for three lives, or twenty-one years, according to the statute of 32 Hen. 8, the condition is good, for the statute doth give him power to make such leases, which may be restrained by condition, and by his own agreement; for this power is not incident to the estate, but given to him collaterally by the Act, according to that rule of law, quilibet potest renuocare juri pro se introducto." And in Mary Portington's Case (1614) 10 Co. Rep. 39 a there is this: "For suppose that a man makes a gift in tail, and further grants, that he may make leases for years or lives according to the said Act: or to levy a fine with proclamations, according to the Acts in such case to bar his issues: provided always, that he shall not make leases, or levy a fine: none will deny but such proviso would be repugnant: and, by consequence, in the other case, when such incidents are tacitly implied"—that is, whether the incidents are mentioned or not, you cannot make a condition of that kind. I think, therefore, Lord Coke must be read with a certain amount of caution, and I may say that, if any one will take the trouble to read two or three passages in Sheppard's Touchstone, he will find that the learned professors of the law are perpetually at loggerheads as to what is a good condition, and the reason is that they have departed from the first principle, that a condition which is repugnant to a gift is a void condition, and the exceptions have been made without any principle at all, and it is therefore perfectly impossible to say by any rule what exceptions are good and what are bad. I should be very sorry to do Sir G. Jessel any injustice, and I must honestly say that in attempting to criticise so able and learned a judge I am always afraid of falling into some error myself, and I am not quite certain that I understand correctly the extent to which in those passages he means to go. If he means to assert that, provided you give a power to mortgage or lease, you may restrain the power to sell, all I can say is, that I most respectfully differ from him, and I cannot understand how, after he had cited the maxim from Coke which he had quoted, he should have tried to lay down any such doctrine.—p. 817.

PORTER, M.R.—Doe v. Yates shows that a name may be voluntarily assumed, and I know of no authority for saying that arms also may not be voluntarily assumed by a person entitled to bear them. Some cases were cited to show that the conduct of the testator had freed the defendant from the condition. . . . That (Walker v. Walker) was a case where the testator by his own act, subsequent to the will, rendered impossible the performance of the condition imposed by the will, and it was held that the condition had been discharged by the testator himself. In Guth v. Burton the condition was that if the legatee should pay a debt due to the testator immediately after the death of the testator, he should receive the legacy, "but not otherwise." The testator, before his death, accepted a composition in bankruptcy from the legatee in discharge of the debt, and the Court held that the legacy was payable, as the debt had been forgiven and abolished by the act of the testator himself. Here again the ratio decidendi was, that owing to what the testator had himself done, the performance of the condition would have involved an impossibility. In the case before us, however, there was no impossibility in the way of assuming the testator's arms. It is absurd to say that by not giving money to do the act he rendered it impossible. We were also referred to Smith, In re. There the question was whether a marriage had been consented to by trustees, and it was held on the facts that their consent had been substantially given. Similarly in Tanner v. Tebbutt there was a condition that the legatees should appear personally before the executors, and prove their identity, and the condition was held to be substantially satisfied by the legatees appearing personally before the solicitor of one executor and the partner of the other acting for them, and establishing their identity to them, on the ground that the condition "personally" only applied to the legatees and not to the executors. Whether rightly or wrongly, these two cases were decided simply on the ground that the conditions imposed on the legatees had been substantially perfected.—p. 355.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It has been held that in order to give effect in such cases [i.e., of forfeiture on bankruptcy] to the obvious intention of the testator, which is to secure the personal enjoyment by the legatee of the property left by the will, a clause of this kind applies to a bankruptcy existing at the testator's death. And so far has this doctrine been carried that in Trappes v. Meredith, which was followed by Ancona v. Waddell, it was held by the C. A. that a forfeiture clause applied to a bankruptcy which took effect before the date of the will, although it was known to the testator. In Trappes v. Meredith the decision of James V.-C. was overruled by the C. A.; but I should have thought the reasoning of the V.-C. in that case was sounder than that of the C. A. However, that decision is binding upon us, and we are not at liberty to hold that this clause does not apply to a bankruptcy which took effect before the will came into operation. . . . It was contended that because the plaintiff had assets falling in which proved sufficient to pay off her creditors, and to enable her to obtain an annulment of the bankruptcy, that gave her the right to deprive the other legatees of the rents and profits which they had received. None of the authorities go to anything like that length, although they have strained the language of these forfeiture clauses. In all those cases nothing had in fact been done before the bankruptcy was annulled. In one case, White v. Chitty Wood, V.-C. said: "I am bound to hold that the act of forfeiture in this instance never occurred, because this gentleman has always been in possession and receipt of these rents, nobody else having been in a position to receive them." So, also, in Lloyd v. Lloyd, the bankruptcy was annulled before anything was done, no steps having been taken to realise the assets; and the same principle was followed in Ancona v. Waddell. On the other hand, in Robertson v. Richardson, it was laid down that if any income became due under the testator's will which the trustee in bankruptcy of the legatee might, but for the forfeiture clause, have received, the forfeiture took effect.—p. 5.

CHITTY, L.J. (for self, LINDLEY, M.R. and V. It is sufficient to refer to Metcalfe v. Metcalfe. There is no authority applying any such doctrine to the case of a condition in a covenant. In this case there is the recital in the settlement that the nephew had created certain charges (without specifying what they were) on his interests under his father's will. In the fact of the recital, it seems to me that it cannot be held that there was an intention to make past charges a ground of forfeiture. Any such supposed intention is directly negatived. . . . If the past charges formed a ground of forfeiture, then the life interest of the nephew ceased the moment it arose, and the covenant never became operative.—p. 134.

JAMES, L.J.—From the year 1828 at least, to the present time, wherever the English language is spoken, wherever the English law prevails, and the English legal literature has been studied, it has been taught and accepted as the unquestioned doctrine of this Court that the death of one of two persons whose consent is required does not destroy the gift, but that the consent of the survivor is sufficient. Lord St. Leonards in Ireland has carried it even further, because, dealing with a question as to land which is supposed to be not subject to the peculiar civil law on which these cases to some extent proceed with relation to real estate, he has decided [Green v. Green] that where a man had the power of jointuring any wife he should marry with the consent of A. B., the death of A. B. did not prevent him from jointuring a wife with whom he afterwards intermarried. On the other hand it is said, and it seems to have been thought by the M.R., in dealing with this petition, that the two authorities which he referred to were the other way. One was Knight v. Cameron . . . but in that case the point was not only not decided, but could not have been decided. There was there the consent required of two executors; one being dead, the lady married without the consent of the other, and all that the M.R. decided in that case was, that she had not married with consent, and there was no decision or dictum to the effect that marriage with the consent of the survivor would not have been a sufficient compliance with the condition. Another case before the late M.R. was referred to as having some bearing on the question, Collett v. Collett; but when that comes to be considered, so far from being an authority, or recognising as was supposed Knight v. Cameron, as an authority the other way, the decision is really, as far as it goes, a strong authority in favour of the proposition contended for by the petitioner in this case: for there a testator, gave a share of his residuary real and personal estate to his daughter, to be paid at twenty-one, or on her day of marriage, provided it should take place with the consent of his widow. The widow died: the daughter married under age, consequently without the consent of the widow, and the M.R. ordered the money to be paid out to the daughter on her marriage, no doubt treating it as a condition subsequent; but he ordered the money to be paid out to her, and he uses this language: "I think the true and proper conclusion to be drawn from the case is that when the performance of a condition in toto has not taken place because the performance of a portion of the condition has become impossible through no act or default of the person who had to perform it, the performance of that portion of the condition will be dispensed with. Here it is reasonably certain that the mother, if she had lived, would have given her consent to this marriage, one eligible in all respects, approved of by the parents and guardian of the lady herself, and sanctioned by the Court. She has therefore performed the condition as far as it was possible for her to do so, but the consent of the dead mother of course could not be procured."—p. 521. JAMES, L.J.—That [Dawson v. Oliver-Massey] was felt to be at the time, and must be admitted to be now, a very strong case indeed. . . . In that case we proceeded in this Court upon a long train of authorities, extending over more than half a century. We considered that, having regard to those authorities, to the opinions of eminent text writers, and to the decision of an eminent L.C. of Ireland in Green v. Green, we were warranted in holding, if not bound to hold, that where the consent of parents was required, and one of the parents had died, the consent of the surviving parent was sufficient. That was what we had to decide, and that was the only point before us for decision. In the judgment delivered by me in that case I am reported to have said that apparently the same principle would apply if both the parents had died. Fry, J., in his judgment in this case, considers the logical result of the decision, that if one parent died the consent of the survivor was sufficient, to be that the death of both parents would dispense with the necessity of any consent. But it must be recollected what was the ground upon which we proceeded in putting upon the will a construction which it seemed to the M.R. impossible properly to put upon it. We thought, having regard to the nature of the case, the nature of the provisions the testator had made, and the purpose of those provisions, that he intended to require the consent of the parent or parents, if any, and that if there were none, then the condition had no effect. There was also this element in the case, that it was utterly impossible, by any mode whatever, to supply the want of a parent or parents. . . . It appears to me that it would be an extension of the decision in Dawson v. Oliver-Massey, which proceeded entirely upon former authorities relating only to the death of a parent, to a case wholly beyond and outside its reasoning and principle, if we were to hold that the temporary non-existence of a guardian or guardians, which temporary non-existence could be supplied at any moment with the greatest ease and without detriment to anybody, would be equivalent to the death of the parent.—p. 70—72.

FOSTER, M.R.—As regards the cases, Dawson v. Oliver-Massey was a case of personal estate. . . . This case [Brown's Will, In re] is clearly not inconsistent with Dawson v. Oliver-Massey, and indeed recognises its authority; but it, too, is a case of personal estate. The case which most nearly resembles the present is Booth v. Meyer. The consent there required was that of the testator. . . . The daughter married James Meyer a year after the death of the testator, but he never gave his consent in writing to the marriage. There was a forfeiture clause in the event of the daughter marrying without such consent. . . . The M.R., after referring to the judgment of the C.A. in Dawson v. Oliver-Massey, held that the forfeiture clause did not take effect, as the consent of the testator was not, under the circumstances, a condition at all. Green v. Green is a case of real estate, and the only one cited. It turned on a clause in a settlement to which stricter rules of construction are applicable than to a will. . . . That case, as I read it, was decided on a question of construction, that if the intention of the settlor was that the condition should not be a condition precedent in a certain event, it would not be regarded as a condition precedent. No doubt the facts of that case were not the same in all respects as those before me; but it appears to me, so far as I can see, to be very much in point, and, being a decision of Lord St. Leonards, it would certainly bind me in this Court, notwithstanding the view of Mr. Jarman (on Wills (5th ed.), vol. ii., p. 852), and perhaps notwithstanding the dictum of Jessel, M.R., in Bellairs v. Bellairs (post, col. 635). Although Booth v. Meyer was a case of personal estate, it is just as applicable as if it was a case of real estate, so far as the construction of the will is concerned.—pp. 355—357.

BACON, V.-C.—The point, however, is covered by a distinct and express and binding authority. In Perrin v. Lyon, the testator devised his real estate to his daughter, subject to the condition that if she should marry a Scotchman, then she should forfeit all benefit under his will, and the estate so given to her should descend to such person or persons as would be entitled to it under the will in the same manner as if her daughter were dead. The daughter, being under age, married a Scotchman who survived her, and she died leaving a son. A case was sent from the Court of Ch. for the opinion of the Court of K. B. upon the question, "who, under the circumstances, was entitled to the devised real estates?" It was elaborately argued by counsel of great ability, and it was determined by Lord Ellenborough and three other judges that the two children of the testator's nephew (who was named in the will) were entitled to the real estates. There is no detailed judgment of the Court of K. B., but there can be no doubt that the decision, applying to the facts of the case as stated, does determine that the condition upon which the estate devised to the daughter in fee was to go over to other persons was perfectly valid, and that, it being broken by the daughter's marriage with a Scotchman, the gift over took immediate effect and annihilated the estate, which, but for the condition, the daughter would have taken; and that, by the breach of that condition, the title of her heir-at-law, and of her husband, as tenant by the courtesy, were excluded, and immediate effect was given to the subsequent limitation.—p. 197.

SELBORNE, L.C.—With regard to Rishton v. Cobb, the respect I feel for the great judge who decided it prevents my saying more of the judgment than that I do not understand it, and that if it were applicable to this case, I should hesitate some time before I could follow it. I think, however, that it is not applicable. In saying so I do not rely on what seems to me a somewhat refined distinction between the gift of the income of a fund and the gift of an annuity, but I refer to what Lord Cottenham himself says, regarding, as he did, the annuity in that case as perpetual, and not for life only (on p. 152): "This is different from a gift of dividends during widowhood. The state of widowhood must determine with the life of the widow." It is quite plain that it is not to be inferred from his judgment that he would have decided the present case otherwise than Fry, L.J. has decided it. Rishton v. Cobb, therefore, does not bear on the present case, and if it did it would take some time to convince me that it ought to be followed.—p. 689. COLERIDGE, C.J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—In that case [Reynish v. Martin] the L.C. held that the condition was inoperative, and that the legacy was payable although the personal estate had been exhausted in the payment of the debts. Nevertheless, as these debts were charged by the will on the real estate, the L.C. made a decree marshalling the assets so that the legacy might be payable. That is an absolute decision that, notwithstanding that the condition was a condition precedent, it was one that was inoperative in a Court of equity, and that the legatee was entitled to the legacy although the condition was not fulfilled. No case has been cited to me, nor am I aware of any, which throws any doubt upon that decision. The rule there laid down is a plain and simple one, which, if it had been strictly adhered to, would have been easy to apply; but Lord Hardwicke himself points out that the rule of the civil and ecclesiastical Courts had not been adopted to its full extent. He says that in many cases where there was a gift over the legacy had been held to be forfeited. . . . Lord Thurlow, in Scott v. Tyler (supra, col. 634), a well-known case upon the whole of the law relating to this subject, comments thus upon the cases. . . . He therefore recognises Lord Cowper's decision in Gillet v. Wray; and that case has been treated as establishing the law by all the subsequent text-writers down to the present time. It is not inconsistent with the decision in Reynish v. Martin, for, as I have already pointed out, the payment of 30l. per annum ceased on marriage, whether with or without consent, and there was no alternative bequest such as is found in Gillet v. Wray. I must therefore treat that as a valid exception to the general rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke. Whether if it had been my lot to decide the case before Lord Cowper I should have decided it the same way, I need not consider; . . . Lord Thurlow, in the passage already quoted from Scott v. Tyler, treats Lord Cowper's decision as determining the general question—What is the effect of a gift of a larger sum to a legatee if she married with consent, and a smaller sum if she did not? Here the question is, What is the effect of a gift to a son in any event with the addition of a larger gift in the event of his marrying with consent? It appears to me that the two cases are substantially the same and ought to be governed by the same rules. This view appears to have been taken in Ireland in Holmes v. Lysaght. That case was afterwards taken to the H. L., but was there compromised. It is not, therefore, a very weighty authority; but so far as it goes it is in favour of the view which I have adopted.—pp. 69—72

verel, I do not profess to understand it as it is reported. The advertisement seems to have been an advertisement for oral evidence to disprove a marriage, by showing that a marriage certificate, which was alleged to refer to two persons not having the names mentioned in the certificate, applied in fact to two persons who really bore those names. That was treated by Lord Maclesfield as being a direct inducement to subornation of perjury. Of course, if it was an attempt to suborn witnesses, it would be a contempt of Court, and an undue interference with the course of justice. With great respect, however, to that learned L.C., I should not have come to the same conclusion on the same facts; and it does not appear to me that an advertisement for a witness to prove a thing not in the knowledge of the man who advertises for it, but which he believes to be true, can be treated as suborna-tion of perjury, because subornation of perjury means doing something to induce people to come forward to prove that which the person seeking to prove it believes to be false; and on that distinction, it appears to me, the case ought to turn,
 . . . but I reserve to myself the fullest power of saying that if ever such a point should come before me, sitting in the C. A., I should feel myself at liberty to disregard the conclusion which was come to by the L.C. in that case.—

RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—Referring to my previously expressed opinion that the Court's have of late been too frequently troubled with applications of this nature, I think the recent decisions in the Chancery Division [Crown Bank, In re, and Coats v. Chadwick], cited by counsel for the applicant have gone too far. The true principle has to my mind been laid down by the C. A. in Hunt v. Clarke. . . . I follow the judgment of the late Cotton, L.J., where he says: "I express my opinion that if a thing is done wilfully which really will prejudice the parties to the cause before it comes on, I should not hesitate to commit to prison any one who so offended; but of course that jurisdiction by the Court is one which is only to be exercised in extreme cases. . . ." Accordingly it is a jurisdiction which cannot properly be exercised in cases where, although a technical contempt has been committed, nothing has been done likely to interfere seriously with the course of justice. The L.J. then proceeds to refer to his judgment in Plating Co. v. Farquharson, in which he said that these applications ought to be discouraged, and that in his view he should not give any one costs who applied to the Court for the purpose of punishing for contempt one who was brought before the Court, unless it were a serious case of contempt really calling for the interference of the Court in order to secure the due administration of justice. He explained that he still adhered to that view, and pointed out that James, L.J. went even further in the same case when he said: "I should make them pay the costs."
 Later on, in his judgment in Hunt v. Clarke, Cotton, L.J., alludes to Clements, In re, in which the late M.R. (Sir G. Jessel) said this: "Therefore it seems to me that this jurisdiction of committing for contempt being practically arbitrary and unlimited should be most jealously and carefully watched, and exercised, if I may say so, with the greatest reluctance and the greatest anxiety on the part of the judges to see whether there is no other mode which is not open to the objection of arbitrariness, and which can be brought to bear upon the subject."—p. 498.

WRIGHT, J.—The true principle which should guide us has been laid down in Hunt v. Clarke, and is this: that motions of this kind should never be made except in really serious cases. As that authority does not appear in the Law

Reports, it is quite possible that it was not brought to the notice of the Courts responsible for some recent decisions which go a greater length.—p. 428.

Jarmain v. Chatterton (1882) 20 Ch. D. 493; 51 L. J. Ch. 471; 30 W. R. 461.—C.A.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is said that by reason of the decision of Ashworth v. Outram, there can be no appeal against the order of the V.-C. refusing to commit. I have read the report of the case over and over again, and I confess I feel in some difficulty about it. . . . The case is shortly reported, and I never attempt to make minute distinctions between cases, but I think the case really meant this. There was there no question of right at all. It was admitted that the defendant there had done wrong, but that she had done so under a misapprehension, and that the wrong was a very trifling wrong, and that the Court would not under these circumstances interfere with the discretion of the judge below. If that is the meaning, Baggallay, L.J.'s observations are pertinent to that particular case only, and not to the general law. If a question of right were involved, they would not be so. It must be merely where the question is purely a matter of discretion. James, L.J. said: "The V.-C. did not think fit to make an order to commit, thinking that it was not necessary to commit for contempt in order to insure future obedience, and did not consider the case one for costs. Both points are matters of discretion, and you cannot appeal from such an order." It is clear that James, L.J. never intended to lay down a new rule, and thus his words must mean that in the circumstances of that case there was no appeal. It means this, that as a general rule the C. A. will not entertain an appeal unless there has been a gross miscarriage.—p. 497.

BRETT, L.J.—What Ashworth v. Outram really meant was, I think, this: In that case there was no dispute as to the meaning of the order, no dispute as to whether the order had been disobeyed or not—but the V.-C., on the circumstances of the case, came to the conclusion that he should exercise his discretion indulgently, that is, he merely made the costs of the motion costs in the cause, and, further, there was no appeal as to the construction of the agreement: the appeal was confined to this: as to the mode of enforcing the order, and was simply from the discretion of the judge; and the C. A. said that when an appeal is simply on this ground, although the Court has jurisdiction on so delicate a matter, it will not exercise it. The case is not now to be questioned. Whether under the circumstances it was a reportable case is another question.—p. 500.

HOLKER, L.J.—I cannot think that the judges who decided Ashworth v. Outram intended to overrule the old cases in Chancery, and certainly not without saying a single word about them. . . . I cannot believe that the judges who decided that case, if they had thought that the old rule had been altered or abrogated by the legislature, would not have said so; but there is not a single word in any of their judgments to that effect. In all probability the explanation given by Brett, L.J. is the correct one.—ib.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I cannot help thinking that Lord Campbell's observations upon consideration would have been very different indeed if the plaintiff in that action had been an original bearer, or if the declaration had gone on to show what a société anonyme was, and had alleged the promise to have been, not only to the first bearer, but to anybody who should become the bearer. There was no such allegation, and the Court said, in the absence of such allegation, they did not know what a société anonyme was—I mean, of course, judicially—and therefore there was no consideration.—p. 261.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—The learned V.-C. appears to have based his decision to some extent on the fact that before the acceptance was posted the defendants had sold the property to another person. The case of Dickinson v. Dodds was relied upon in support of that defence. In that case, however, the plaintiff knew of the subsequent sale before he accepted the offer, which in my judgment, distinguishes it entirely from the present case.

BRAMWELL, B.—That certainly is directly in favour of the plaintiffs as reported in the Common Bench Report. But I doubt the accuracy of that report. The point is not mentioned in the report of the Law Journal, and in the report in 8 C. B. at p. 212, Maule, J. refers to a case of Hurey v. Johnston, mentioned in the report as 7 C. B. 295, but really 6 C. B. 295. That case was an action for breach of promise of marriage, and the evidence of acceptance of the offer was, the plaintiff's going to the place where she was to be married; and in Duncan v. Topham, the plaintiff accepted the offer by sending off the goods as desired; and see per Cresswell, J. (6 C. B. at p. 304). So that it may be that the Court refused the rule, not on the ground that the posting of the letter, without delivery, was a sufficient acceptance of the offer, but on the ground that the sending of the goods was sufficient.—p. 120.

JAMES, L.J.—The decision of the Vice-Chancellor Malins seems to me to be entirely in accordance with a great number of cases in this Court, and to be utterly undistinguishable, in principle or in fact, from Dunlop v. Higgins, a case which is binding upon us, and in which every principle argued before us was discussed at length by the Lord Chancellor in giving judgment. He arrived at the conclusion that the posting of the letter of acceptance is the completion of the contract; that is to say, the moment one man has made an offer, and the other has done something binding himself to that offer, then the contract is complete, and neither party can afterwards escape from it. That is in fact the decision in Hebb's Case (L. R. 4 Eq. 9), though in that particular case a distinction was taken by the Master of the Rolls that the company chose to send the letter to their own agent, which agent had not been authorised by the applicant to receive it, on his behalf. Against this current of authority there is the case of British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, in which the Court of Exchequer—not disputing the authority of previous decisions, because, of course, they could not dispute the authority of a case in the House of Lords—established a distinction which does not apply to this case at all. The Court there held that, although the posting of a letter, if the letter arrives, is a complete contract, yet if from any cause, such as a failure of duty by the Post Office, the letter never arrives at all, then there is a difference. It seems to me not necessary to express an opinion whether the distinction is sound or not, but that was the ground upon which the judges proceeded in that case.—p. 592.

COTTON, L.J.—Then it was said that these letters referred to letters, and that we should consider those other letters and that other terms were introduced by them: and the case of Hussey v. Horne-Payne was relied on as showing that in such circumstances there was no concluded contract. But the judgment of Lord Cairns in that case shows that it was not because the subsequent letters raised a doubt that it was held that the two original letters did not form a complete agreement, but because the two original letters of themselves contained terms which raised the doubt. That case, therefore, is not applicable, and in my opinion there was a binding contract constituted by these two letters alone.—p. 430.

KAY, J.—I have read Lord Cairns' judgment [in Hussey v. Horne-Payne] more than once, and, with deference, I do not think that the observation of Cotton, L.J. in Bolton v. Lambert to be a just criticism. Both he and Lord Selborne seemed to me to lay down broadly that where it is sought to make out a binding contract from correspondence, the whole of it, as well as the verbal communications at interviewing, should be regarded, and it is not right to stop at one letter of the correspondence, which with what preceded might constitute a sufficient agreement within the Statute of Frauds, whereas if the whole of the correspondence were considered, and, particularly, as Lord Selborne says, "the sequel" of the communications, it may clearly appear that those letters were in truth only part of an uncompleted negotiation. As was said by Lindley, L.J. in May v. Thomson (51 L. J. Ch. 917; 20 Ch. D. 705), the case of Hussey v. Horne-Payne before the H. L., shows that we must look at the whole correspondence from beginning to end. . . . In my opinion the decision of Hussey v. Horne-Payne completely covers this case. I understand it to mean that if two letters standing alone would be evidence of a sufficient contract, yet a negotiation for an important term of the purchase and sale carried on afterwards is enough to show that the contract was not complete; and, so far as my own judgment is concerned, I entirely agree in the justice and equity of such a rule.—pp. 475, 476.

BACON, V.-C.—The common law case which has been cited I should not accept as an authority under any circumstances in this Court of equity, where the doctrine of specific performance of an agreement has been established for so many years and in so many cases. That case has really no application to the one now before me. In that case the agreement was to do a thing clearly defined. The manner of doing it was not to be settled afterwards. That is not the agreement before me.

ROMER, J.—I think the case that really comes nearest to the present is Crossley v. Maycock, and in my opinion Gibbins v. North-Eastern Metropolitan District Asylum, on which the plaintiff relied, is distinguishable. In that case it was alleged in the bill that an enclosure sent to the defendant was only a formal document, merely embodying the contract constituted by an offer and an acceptance. The defendant, in whose possession the document was, did not choose to produce it; and therefore it was assumed, as against him, that that allegation in the bill was correct. Consequently, it was not a case where, simultaneously with a letter purporting to accept an offer, a document containing additional and important terms is sent requiring it to be signed by the person to whom it is sent. That case, therefore, is not an authority for the case before me, and, as I have said, I think the real binding authority is Crossley v. Maycock.—p. 565.

KEKEWICH, J. held, distinguishing the above case, that in an agreement for sale of a house by the plaintiff, a condition "subject to the preparation by my solicitor, and completion of a formal contract," was not for the benefit of the plaintiff only, and could not be waived by him, and consequently that he could not enforce specific performance of the agreement.

 WILLES, J.—The general rule is that locus regit actum, and, though I fully recognise the principle upon which the judgment in this Court in Leroux v. Brown professes to be founded, viz., that the procedure is regulated by the lex fori, I am not satisfied that either of the sections of the Statute of Frauds to which reference has been made warrants the decision. We must, however, act upon Leroux v. Brown, until it is overruled by a Court of error.—p. 316.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It was settled by Leroux v. Brown that the Statute [of Frauds] does not affect the validity of the contract, but only makes a particular kind of proof necessary to enable a party to bring an action upon it. . . . The policy of the enactment is well explained in Welford v. Beazley, and Barbours v. Young. The object of the statute being merely to exclude parol evidence, any writing embodying the terms of the agreement and signed by the person to be charged is sufficient.

Rochevoucauld v. Boustead (1896) 66 L. J. Ch. 74; [1897] 1 Ch. 196; 75 L. T. 502; 45 W. R. 272.—C.A. RAISBURY, L.C., LINDLEY and SMITH, L.J.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court).—But having regard to Leroux v. Brown, and to the language of sect. 7 of the Statute of Frauds, we are unable to see why the defendant should not be able to rely on that statute as a defence to any proceedings in this country having for their object the proof and enforcing of a trust, even of lands abroad. The statute relates to the kind of proof required in this country to enable a plaintiff suing here to establish his case here. It does not relate to lands abroad in any other way than this: it regulates procedure here, not titles to land in other countries. If, therefore, the statute afforded the defendant a defence, he would be entitled to the benefit of it.

MELLOR, J.—Several cases have been decided on the point now raised, particularly two cases which came before the M.R.: Sale v. Lambert and Potter v. Duffield. In the first of these cases a memorandum of agreement was held to be sufficient within the Statute of Frauds, though the vendor was not described otherwise than as the "proprietor" of the premises, the M.R. saying that the term "proprietor" was an excellent description, and apparently holding that this word, with nothing else in the document to enlarge it, was quite sufficient. Now, comparing this decision with the later one, Potter v. Duffield, where the same learned judge held that the description "vendor" was insufficient, I have some difficulty in assenting to it. I think, however, that we ought to hold ourselves bound by the last of these two cases, holding that the word "vendor" is insufficient, though, as far as my judgment goes, I can see no distinction between the nature of the memorandum in either case. I think that the description which should enable us to dispense with the actual names of the parties ought to be very precise and exact, and that in neither of the cases was this requirement complied with.—p. 720.

QUAIN, J.—With regard to Casson v. Roberts, I do not think it has much bearing upon the present question, but I must say that I do not think the reasons upon which it proceeded are satisfactory.—p. 724.

JESSEL, M.R.—The view of Fry, J. was that because the agreement itself had a date, therefore that was the date from which the lease was to begin. I must say that not only is there no authority for such a proposition as a proposition of law, but there is a good deal of authority against it. Amongst other authorities is the case of Blore v. Sutton, decided by Sir William Grant, which is exactly in point, but which Fry, J., in his previous decision in Jaques v. Miller, attempted to distinguish on the ground that it did not appear in the report of Blore v. Sutton, that the date on which the memorandum of agreement was signed appeared on the memorandum itself. I must say, speaking with deference to the learned author of that observation, that I had come to an opposite conclusion on reading the report, but in order to be quite certain I sent for the record, and there it appears, as I expected, that the date was in the memorandum, and, therefore, that supposed distinction between Jaques v. Miller and Blore v. Sutton does not exist. But, independently of that, I am quite unable to concur in the decision in Jaques v. Miller.—p. 239.

 LORD LOUGHBOROUGH (for the Court).—The early cases, in Prae. in Chan. 208 and 374, do not seem fairly to admit any other construction than this, namely, that the Court thought that, where a parol agreement was admitted by the defendant's answer, he might or might not take advantage of the statute at his option. I say the Court seem to have thought so, because, in fact, no such decree was made in those cases, which contain merely the extra-judicial opinions of the lord keeper and the Master of the Rolls. It is said in those cases, and has been adopted in the argument, that where the defendant confesses the agreement there is no danger of perjury, which was the only thing the statute intended to prevent. But this seems to be very bad reasoning for the calling upon a party to answer a parol agreement certainly lays him under a great temptation to commit perjury.—

SMITH, L.J. (for the Court).—Our attention has been called to Smith v. Webster as an authority for the proposition that no recognition by the officers of the company of the contract by their signature will avail to take the case out of the operation of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, unless such officers had authority to sign a record of the contract as such; but I do not think that Smith v. Webster bears this out, although some of the language of Lush, L.J. might bear that interpretation. . . . It seems to me that all that is decided by Smith v. Webster is that, if reliance is placed on the signature of an agent, as satisfying the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, you must, whether the document signed be a record of the terms, or a document referring to and recognising the document containing the record of the terms, show that the agent signing was an agent "thereunto lawfully authorised," but that is all that is necessary.

DENMAN, C.J.—Lord Eldon says in that case, "Where a party, or principal, or person to be bound, signs as what he cannot be, a witness, he cannot be understood to sign otherwise than as a principal." But I think that remark open to much observation. A witness might be drawn into transactions which he did not contemplate, and of which he was ignorant. That would be a great step to take; no such decision has been actually made; and if it had, I should pause, unless I found it sanctioned by the very highest authority, before I held that a party attesting was bound by the instrument.—p. 508.

WILLES, J.—Mosley v. Tinkler (1 C. M. & R. 692), therefore, is confirmatory of our decision that the whole evidence of an agreement need not be in writing, but only all the terms, along with the signature of the person to be charged. It has been urged upon us that this conclusion will lead to fraud and perjury, and to the very mischiefs the statute was passed to prevent. We do not concur in that view, because no one will be able to enforce an agreement of the sort we are now discussing, without proving that he did or was ready to do his part to entitle him to performance on the part of the other contracting party. Moreover, if good for anything, that argument is good to show that a regular agreement or memorandum of it, signed by one party only, ought not to bind him. The reason we have given is a good answer to the argument, but that argument was also considered by the Court of Common Pleas in Laythorp v. Bryant (2 Bing. N. C. 735), where the Court held, in spite of a weighty dictum of Sir T. Plumer, in Martin v. Mitchell, that only the party to be charged need sign; the other party, however, at the same time being ready to fulfil his own part of the agreement before suing.—p. 353.

DAMPIER, J.—In Saunderson v. Jackson it did not appear that there was any signature to the bill of parcels: it was only by connecting the letter with the bill of parcels, that the case was taken out of the statute. Here there is the handwriting of the party to be charged in the bill of parcels, which authenticates it as a memorandum of the bargain.—p. 390.

Hucklesby v. Hook (1900) 82 L. T. 117.

BUCKLEY, J.—These cases, I think, proceed upon the principle that signing for the purposes of the statute does not necessarily mean writing your name, but means ratifying by writing in some form or other the document which contains the contract. That is the principle which lies, I think, at the root of Schneider v. Norris . . . and of Evans v. Hoare . . . That, therefore, seems to me to be the principle of these two cases, that there was a writing by the defendant, or by an agent of the defendant, of some part or the whole of a document containing the defendant's name. The other case proceeds upon a somewhat different principle. That is the case of Torret v. Cripps . . . I think that involves this as a matter of principle, that it may be a signature in writing within the statute for a person to take a document and hand it to another and say, the document being in his writing, "That is the document which I ask you to take as forming the contract which you are going to sign." Now, here, the defendant wrote no part of the document at all. The mere fact that it contained his name, that it was written by the plaintiff and addressed to him, is, I think, upon many grounds, insufficient to make this a contract within the statute.—pp. 117, 118.

CHITTY, J.—When the case is examined as a whole, it will be seen that the judgment turned upon this, that they considered that as the trees were to be cut down as soon as possible, and that they were almost immediately cut down, the thing sold was a chattel. . . . The true basis of the present Master of the Rolls' [Brett, L.J.'s] judgment is, I think, found at the bottom of p. 42, where he says that "the contract is not for an interest in land, but relates solely to the thing sold itself." Though that case may be open hereafter to further consideration, of course I cannot reconsider it, nor can I differ from it. . . . I leave that case as it stands on its own footing, and must decide this case, which appears to me to be so different from that as at any rate to justify me in coming to the conclusion, as I do, that this case comes within the 4th section.—pp. 573, 574.

BOWEN, L.J.—It was laid down in Peter v. Clompton (Skinner 353), as the headnote states, that "an agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof" means, in the Statute of Frauds, an agreement which appears from its terms to be incapable of performance within the year." Wells v. Horton (4 Bing. 40) was decided in accordance with that view, and so also was Murphy v. Sullivan (11 Ir. Jur. (N.S.) 111). In so far as Davey v. Shannon departs from these principles, it seems to me to run counter to the current of authority on the subject.

MARTIN, B.—The judges in Gore v. Gibson use the word "void," it is true, but I cannot think they meant absolutely void. They simply meant to say that a drunken man's contract could not be enforced against his will. But it by no means follows that it is incapable of ratification.—p. 133.

COLLOCK, B.—The case of Gore v. Gibson was, no doubt, rightly decided, but some of the dicta of the judges cannot be supported in all their fulness, since the decision in Molton v. Camroux (L. R. 2 Ex. 487; L. R. 4 Ex. 17; 18 L. J. Ex. 68, 356).—p. 134.

COCKBURN, C.J. (for the Court).—We entirely concur in the principle on which the decision in Robson v. Drummond rests, namely, that where a person contracts with another to do work or perform service, and it can be inferred that the person employed has been selected with reference to his individual skill, competency or other personal qualification, the inability or unwillingness of the party so employed, to execute the work or perform the service, is a sufficient answer to any demand by a stranger to the original contract for the performance of it by the other party, and entitles the latter to treat the contract as at an end, notwithstanding that the person tendered to take the place of the contracting party may be equally well qualified to do the service. Personal performance is in such a case of the essence of the contract, which, consequently, cannot in its absence be enforced against an unwilling party. But this principle appears to us inapplicable in the present instance, inasmuch as we cannot suppose that in stipulating for the repairs of these waggons by the company—a rough description of work which ordinary workmen conversant with the business would be perfectly able to execute—the defendants attached any importance to whether the repairs were done by the company or by anyone with whom the company might enter into a subsidiary contract to do the work. All that the hirers, the defendants, cared for in their stipulation was that the waggons should be kept in repair; it was indifferent to them by whom the repairs should be done. Thus, if without going into liquidation, or assigning these contracts, the company had entered into a contract with any competent party to do the repairs, and so had procured them to be done, we cannot think that this would have been a departure from the terms of the contract to keep the waggons in repair. While fully acquiescing in the general principle just referred to, we must take care not to push it beyond reasonable limits. And we cannot but think that, in applying the principle, the Court of Queen's Bench in Robson v. Drummond went to the utmost length to which it can be carried.—p. 324.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—With regard to the first point, as to the death of one partner putting an end to the contract, there seems to me to be greater difficulty. Apparently the principle of law is this—that it is to be determined in each case whether the obligation to be enforced depends upon the personal conduct of the party deceased. This appears to be the effect of the decisions in Tasker v. Shepherd and Robson v. Drummond. . . . Accordingly, where in any particular case a contract has relation to the personal conduct of the contracting party, that party's death puts an end to it; but if it has no relation to such personal conduct, the death of the contracting party will not put an end to it. In the case before us, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs did not rely on the personal conduct of the three partners, all of whom were unknown to them. Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that the liability undertaken by the three partners to carry out their contract can be enforced against the two survivors, notwithstanding the death of one of the three.—p. 28.

BLACKBURN, J.—We cannot overrule a decision of the Exchequer Chamber; but there is a distinct ground on which case cannot be supported. The cases under statute 27 Eliz. c. 4, which have decided that by sect. 2 voluntary gifts by settlement after marriage are void against subsequent purchasers for value, and are not saved by sect. 4, show that natural love and affection are not a sufficient consideration whereon an action of assumpsit may be founded.—p. 399.

Blythe, In re, Banner, Ex parte (1881) 17 Ch. D. 480; 51 L. J. Ch. 300; 44 L. T. 908; 30 W. R. 24.—C.A. JAMES, BRETT and COTTON, L.J.J. BRETT, L.J.—Whenever a similar case arises, I think it will have to be carefully considered whether the decision in Callisher v. Bischoffsheim can be supported, and whether, in order to support a compromise of an action, it is not necessary to show, not only that the plaintiff believed that he had a good cause of action, but that the circumstances did in fact raise some doubt whether there was or was not a good cause of action, and I venture to doubt whether, if there was clearly and obviously no cause of action, the mere belief of the parties that there was would support the compromise. It is true that the subsequent case of Ockford v. Barelli, if that be also held to be good law, is an authority against this view, because in it there could not possibly be a doubt that there was no cause of action. But I take it that Ockford v. Barelli was decided upon the authority of Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, adopting the view that the passage which I have read from the earlier part of the judgment of Cockburn, L.C.J. was the ground of the decision. Of course if it were so taken the Court, in the later case, being a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, was bound by the decision in the earlier case; but then, if the first case falls, the second would fall with it.—p. 490.

[The passage referred to from the judgment of Cockburn, L.C.J., in Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, is at p. 451: "The authorities clearly establish that if an agreement is made to compromise a disputed claim, forbearance to sue in respect of that claim is a good consideration."]

COTTON, L.J.—Now there was much argument upon the question, what is a good consideration for a compromise: and there are authorities which for a considerable time were considered as laying down the law upon the subject; but Lord Esher, the present Master of the Rolls, in Ex parte Banner, is supposed to have thrown doubt upon these authorities; and what he said was, in fact, that, if the question ever came before this Court, the authority of Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, Ockford v. Barelli and Cook v.

Wright would have to be considered. . . I consider, notwithstanding the doubt expressed by the Master of the Rolls, that the doctrine laid down in Cook v. Wright and Callisher v. Bischoffsheim and Ockford v. Barelli is the law of this Court.

PARKE, B. (for the Court)—One other case cited for the plaintiff remains to be noticed: it is that of Grenaire v. Le Clerc Bois Valon, in which Lord Ellenborough held that the plaintiff could recover for surgery and medicines, though he had not been admitted pursuant to the statute of 3 Hen. 8, c. 11, s. 1. It is certainly difficult to reconcile this case with the rule above laid down, for the provisions of that statute were clearly meant to secure to the public skilful practitioners in surgery and medicine; but, on a motion for a new trial, the Court of King's Bench do not appear to have sanctioned the doctrine of Lord Ellenborough, for they disposed of the case on another ground, namely, that there was no proof that the plaintiff had not been duly licensed. We therefore think that case is not a binding authority.—p. 159.

Headnote.—A contract is illegal whereby a defendant in a criminal case who has been ordered to find bail for his good behaviour during a specified period, deposits money with his surety upon the terms that the money is to be retained by the surety during the specified period for his own protection against the defendant's default, and at the expiration of that period is to be returned, and no action by the defendant in the criminal case will lie to recover back the money deposited with the surety either before or after the expiration of the specified period, although the defendant in the criminal case has not committed any default, and although the surety has not been compelled to pay the amount for which he has become bound.

FRY, L.J.—We were pressed with the observations of the M.R. in Herman v. Jeuchner, where it was said that he had recognised the proposition that so long as the contract remained imperfectly performed, the money could be recovered back. In my opinion the language used by the M.R. does not bear that construction, because in that case the Court thought the contract had been fully performed, and, therefore, no doubt, in speaking of performance he spoke of full performance; but, whatever the construction of those words may be, I have, as I have already stated, the authority of the M.R. to state his concurrence with the view I have expressed with regard to the partial performance of an illegal contract.

JERVIS, C.J.—The case of Beaumont v. Reeve, much relied upon in the Court below, does not, in our judgment, affect the question. It is clear that past cohabitation and previous seduction are not good considerations for a parole promise; but they are not therefore illegal considerations. They are no considerations at all; and inasmuch as a bond, or other instrument under seal, is good without any consideration, it by no means follows that a covenant to pay a sum of money tainted with illegality, can be enforced merely because a bond for maintenance founded upon past cohabitation or previous seduction is good. If an agreement had been made to pay a sum of money in consideration of future cohabitation, and, after cohabitation, the money being unpaid, a bond had been given to secure that money, that would be the same case as this; and such a bond could not, under such circumstances, be enforced.—p. 649.

KAY, J.—This amounts to a distinct decision that the mere continuance of a cohabitation raises no kind of presumption that a bond given during such cohabitation was given for an immoral consideration.—p. 356.

BRETT, L.J.—I think that we ought to treat that case (Ward v. Lloyd) as binding on us. It has been contended that the decision in that case has been in effect overruled by the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in Williams v. Bayley. The proposition of law laid down in Ward v. Lloyd is that if a debt really exists, the right to sue for it must be upheld, even although there may have been a threat by the creditor of criminal proceedings; in Williams v. Bayley the only consideration for the respondent rendering himself liable for his son's debts was the giving up of certain forged documents, in respect of which the son might have been prosecuted. In the present case the indorsement of the bills to the plaintiff was not invalid.—p. 575.

TINDAL, C.J. (for Exchequer Chamber).—In Drage v. Ibberson Lord Kenyon adverted to, and stated that he should adhere to, the class of cases which held that the consideration for an agreement being the settlement of a misdemeanour, might be good in law. Thus a settlement of an indictment for a nuisance, preferred by public authority, was held [in Fallowes v. Taylor] a lawful consideration for a bond binding the defendant to remove the nuisance; we presume, on the ground which is not very satisfactory, that the main object of the prosecution—the removal of the nuisance—was thereby effected. But the Court seem to have overlooked the consideration that a defendant who had infringed a public right was thereby entirely freed from the punishment due to a violation of public law. In Edgcombe v. Rodd (5 East 294), Le Blanc, J. assigns this as a reason for the consideration being illegal, that there the prosecution was for a public misdemeanour and not for a private injury to the prosecutor. It is difficult to reconcile this principle, which we think a just one, with the decision in Fallowes v. Taylor; nor can Pool v. Bousfield be reconciled with it. There an agreement to stifle a motion against the defendant, that he should answer the matters of an affidavit, was held illegal.—p. 393.

It is difficult to comprehend the case of Johnson v. Ogilby, as stated in Peere Williams' Reports. There a prosecution for a fraud was suppressed, and that suppression made the consideration for an agreement to pay money. The distinction between felony and misdemeanour seems to have been the foundation of the decision, if it was made, by Lord Talbot, a distinction overruled in Collins v. Blanton (2 Wils. 341), which was decided at a later period. It is not, indeed, at all clear that the indictment for the fraud was compromised, as a part of the agreement, or that the fraud was an indictable one; and perhaps the case may be so explained; if not, it cannot, we conceive, be sustained as law.—p. 393.

FRY, J.—But then it is said that, over and above the rule that the contract shall be reasonable, there exists another rule, viz., that the contract shall be limited as to space, and that this contract being in its terms unlimited as to space, and, therefore, extending to the whole of England and Wales, must be void (p. 366) . . . Undoubtedly, Vice-Chancellor Wickens, of whose judgments I can never speak without the highest respect, came to the conclusion that such an artificial rule existed, and he so expressed himself in Allsopp v. Wheatcroft (p. 367) . . . I have, therefore upon the authorities, to choose between two sets of cases, those which recognise, and those which refuse to recognise this supposed rule, and for the reasons which I have already mentioned, I have no hesitation in saying that I adhere to those authorities which refuse to recognise this rule, and I consider that the cases, in which an unlimited prohibition has been spoken of as void, relate only to circumstances in which such a prohibition has been unreasonable.—p. 369

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that Mr. Levett's contention that you are to treat a restraint of trade as prima facie bad, and throw upon the person supporting it the onus of showing that it is reasonable, is introducing a wholly unsound principle into the construction of documents. I do not think that James, V.-C., in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsort, meant to lay down any such rule. . . . Looking at the whole of the language, I do not understand his lordship as saying that you are to approach the contract with a leaning either way. You are to construe the contract and then see whether it is legal.

CHITTY, J.—The principle upon which the Court acts in thus severing the parts of the contract is very neatly stated by Willes, J., in Pickering v. Iffracombe Ry., where he says: "The general rule is, that where you cannot sever the legal from the illegal part of a covenant, the contract is altogether void; but where you can sever them, whether the illegality be created by statute or common law, you may reject the bad part and retain the good." . . . In Price v. Green there were, in fact, two covenants, or one covenant which on its face was divisible into two parts. . . . So, too, in Nicholls v. Stretton, there were two classes of persons, and therefore there was no difficulty in severing the covenant into two parts, the one distinct from the other. . . . In Baines v. Geary, as it appears to me—although I am not quite sure whether I read the judgment aright—it was possible to divide the covenant into two parts. Although I am not myself now concerned in putting any construction on the particular instrument which was the subject of that case, I think I should have decided that case in the same way as did North, J. I also think that the principle of his decision was that which I have just now been stating, for he refers to and discusses both Price v. Green and Nicholls v. Stretton, and, in fact, bases his decision upon those cases. That being so, I think he based his decision on the same principle as that which I am following; nor do I think that he intended to lay down any principle at variance with that upon which I have laid stress—namely, that the Court cannot create or carve out a new covenant for the sake of validating an instrument which would otherwise be void.—pp. 890, 891.

KAY, L.J.—What is proposed here is to sever a proviso from the rest of the agreement; in the other case [Baines v. Geary] it was dividing one covenant into two parts. It is not proposed here to separate the part which is bad from the part which is good, but to separate the covenant from the proviso, which explains the meaning of the whole, and then to give a different meaning to the whole case by striking the proviso out. Such a mode of construction is not possible.

COTTON, L.J.—It is true that in Allen v. Taylor, where there was a contract not to carry on the trade of a rug-merchant, it was held that merely acting as clerk or assistant to a person carrying on that trade was not a breach of the covenant. But an agreement not to carry on a trade is a very different thing from an agreement not to carry on a business or profession. "Carrying on a trade" implies, to my mind, that the person engaged in it is engaged in it quâ trade—that is to say, as a trade producing profit or loss which is to be shared by him; and that is not the case of a merely salaried assistant. I cannot come to the conclusion that a man is less carrying on the profession of a surgeon because he is doing so as assistant to some one else. "Profession" is different from "trade," and it is much more emphatic to my mind, than if "business" alone were here. When, as here, the words "carry on the business or profession of surgeon" are merely used to denote what is done by a man acting as surgeon, a man, in my opinion, acts as surgeon and carries on the business of a surgeon none the less because he is not the principal or engaged in the business as a partner, but is merely carrying it on as assistant to somebody else.—p. 228.

FRY, L.J.—In that case (Taylor v. Bowers) Melish, L.J., in delivering judgment, says at p. 300: "If money is paid, or goods delivered for an illegal purpose, the person who has so paid the money or delivered the goods may recover them back before the illegal purpose is carried out." . . . Notwithstanding the very high authority of the learned judge who expressed the law in the terms which I have read, I cannot help saying for myself that I think the extent of the application of that principle, and even the principle itself, may, at some time hereafter, require consideration, if not in this Court, yet in a higher tribunal; and I am glad to find that in expressing that view I have the entire concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice.

COTTON, L.J.—The doctrine of Hochster v. De la Tour seems to be that, where a party to a contract has made statements before the time for performance has arrived, importing a refusal to perform or to be bound by the contract, the other party, if he chooses, may elect to act upon such statements as a renunciation of the entire contract, and may thereupon treat the same as a breach of the contract and bring his action. If he so elects, his election relieves the other party from any further obligation, and enables both parties to make arrangements for the future on the footing that the contract has been once for all broken, and is at an end. The law is thus stated by Cockburn, C.J. in the case of Frost v. Knight: "The law with reference to a contract to be performed at a future time, where the party bound to performance announces prior to the time his intention not to perform it, as established by the cases of Hochster v. De la Tour and Dumble and Black Sea Co. v. Xenos (18 C. B. (N.S.) 825; 31 L. J. C. P. 284) on the one hand, and Avery v. Bourden (5 E. & B. 714; 26 L. J. Q. B. 3), Reid v. Hoskins (6 E. & B. 953; 26 L. J. Q. B. 5) and Barwick v. Buba (2 C. B. (N.S.) 563; 26 L. J. C. P. 280) on the other, may be thus stated. The promisee, if he pleases, may treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequences of non-performance; but in that case he keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own. He remains subject to all the obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it; on the other hand, the promisee may, if he thinks proper, treat the repudiation of the other party as a wrongful putting an end to the contract, and may at once bring his action as on a breach of it; and in such action he will be entitled to such damages as would have arisen from non-performance of the contract at the appointed time, subject, however, to abatement in respect of any circumstances which may have afforded him the means of mitigating his loss." That expression of the law was cited with approval by Keating, J. in the case of Roper v. Johnson (L. R. 8 C. P. 167). It must be taken, therefore: that the law is that, when one party has done an act which amounts to wrongful renunciation of the contract and the other has acted upon it as such, there is a cause of action in respect thereof; but, when the other has not done so, then both the parties, as well he who has attempted to renounce the contract as he who asserts its existence, are entitled to the benefit of its provisions. The Divisional Court in the present case treated the statements made by the plaintiff as a renunciation of the contract within the doctrine I have mentioned. I cannot say I think they were right in so doing. But, assuming that they were, I can find no case which shows that the doctrine in question applies to the renunciation of one particular covenant or stipulation in a contract such as a lease, which contains many. And, as at present advised, I am favourably impressed with the view that the doctrine would apply to the case of a lease where the tenant cannot, in consequence of the refusal by the landlord to perform a particular covenant put an end to the entire contract.—p. 470.

SELBORN, L.C.—Now, I do not think it possible to deny that Earlom v. Saunders, before Lord Hardwicke, and, at all events, the opinion of Lord Redesdale in Cowley v. Hartstonge, in this House, show that limitations appropriate to real estate may in such a case be important evidence in the proper construction of a will, and may justify some apparent violence being done to the words of option in order to give effect to the general intent. Before I refer to the particular circumstances under which the decisions in those cases were made, I think it expedient to state what I understand to be the principle which underlies those decisions, and is indeed the universal principle adopted by all the Courts of this country in the construction of wills. You look to the whole will, and endeavour from every part of it to ascertain the intention, and if in some parts the form of expression may point in a particular direction, yet there may be in the rest of the will, and in the general scheme, as is sometimes said, or in its particular provisions taken together, sufficient indication that the first impression arising from the literal construction of a particular portion of it is not to be trusted; and that the true intention was that which the Court can carry out by supplementing the actual words; that is to say, by accomplishing the general purpose at all events, and by making the particular words subordinate to that general purpose. That principle is not exclusively applicable to cases of this particular kind; it is general, though in my judgment one to be always applied with great discrimination and caution. . . . As I have said, it is not for your lordships to express any opinion whatever as to those particular decisions in the way of criticism. Such as they are, they depend upon the general canon which I have mentioned, and upon the particular circumstances; and these circumstances appear to me to be entirely distinguishable from the circumstances of the present case.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Now I think that Lawes v. Bennett decided that, where there is a contract giving an option of purchase of real estate and the option is not exercised till after the death of the person who created the option, nevertheless the proceeds of the sale go as part of his personal estate, and not as part of his real estate. . . . In Edwards v. West, which was before Fry, J., it was attempted to extend the principle of Lawes v. Bennett to the person exercising the option, Lawes v. Bennett only having decided as regards the party giving the option. The view which I take was supported by Fry, J.—pp. 399, 400.

COTTON, L.J.—The contract is one entered into with the lessee, his executors, administrators and assigns, and before I go further I agree that this covenant would be one the benefit of which would pass with the assignment of the lease, because it is a covenant with the lease, if he, his executors, administrators, or assigns shall give a certain notice, that the lessor would convey. The "assigns" there must mean the assigns of the lease, and it is entirely different from . . . Green v. Low, where there being not a lease, but an agreement for a lease, there was superadded to that an independent contract that if the person who had the right to get a lease gave notice, then the lessor, the owner of the estate, would sell it to him: and the M.R. held that though the right to the lease was gone, there was an independent agreement to grant the fee if demanded within a certain time. What the M.R. said shows that this must depend upon the particular form of the contract in each case, and must depend upon the true construction of it. The M.R. said that, upon the true construction of the contract, the right to purchase was independent of the right to a lease, and he decreed the specific performance of the agreement to sell. That is entirely different from this case, where the option given is to the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns. There the M.R. recognised the principle, which, of course, could not be disputed, that in such a case the true effect of the contract must depend upon the construction of the particular document.—p. 402. JESSEL, M.R.—But then it was said that the decree of the Court was partially wrong. Now, as to that Flanagan v. Flanagan appears to me unanswerable. [His honour read the statement of this case contained in the judgment in Fletcher v. Ashburner.] I am aware that the decision of Shadwell, V.-C., in Jermyn v. Preston, and the decision of Lord Romilly in Cooke v. Dealey, appear at first sight to be antagonistic to this. In Jermyn v. Preston the report does not state the trusts of the term the estate subject to which had been sold: but counsel on both sides appear to have said that the Court had sold more than was necessary. How that could be is difficult to understand, for it appears from the report that the decree ordered a sale or mortgage, with the Master's approbation, of a sufficient part of the estates comprised in the term, and that the Master made a report approving of the sale, by which he must have found that a sufficient part was sold. Again, the judgment in Cooke v. Dealey is based on a general principle assumed to have been laid down in Ackroyd v. Smithson, viz., that the conversion of real estate into personally only takes effect to the extent of the object required, and that beyond this the rights of the parties remain the same as if no conversion had taken place. But all that Ackroyd v. Smithson decided was, that a conversion directed by a testator is a conversion only for the purposes of the will, and that all that is not wanted for these purposes must go to the person who would have been entitled but for the will. It does not decide that if the Court or a trustee sell more than is necessary there is any equity to convert the surplus for the benefit of the heir-at-law of the person entitled at the time of the sale. As I have already remarked, it is not necessary to decide that question now: but it seems to me that if a conversion is rightfully made, whether by the Court or a trustee, all the consequences of a conversion must follow: and that there is no equity in favour of the heir or any one else to take the property in any other form than that in which it is found: and that the sole question to be considered in all these cases is, whether the estate has been rightfully or wrongfully sold.—p. 196.

KAY, J., after discussing the above cases, continued.—It seems to me that the result of these authorities is clearly this: that if in an administration action the Court exercises its undoubted jurisdiction and makes an order for sale, that order for sale itself amounts to a conversion. That was decided by Hall, V.-C. in Arnold v. Dixon.—p. 254.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—The jurisdiction of the Court to order the sale of timber on a settled estate, when it is for the benefit of all parties interested in the settled estate, is well established, and in such a case the tenant for life, though impeachable for waste, is entitled to the income produced by the proceeds of sale of the timber.—Thoker v. Auneley (1832) 5 Sim. 235.—SHAW-WELT, V.-C.... This being so, I think on principle that where timber has been rightfully sold under an order of the Court all the consequences of conversion must follow, and that there is no equity as between the heir and the legal personal representative of the owner in fee. This is the view taken by Sir G. Jessel in Steed v. Preece, and by Kay, J. in Hyett v. Mekin. It is contended, however, that the point was decided in the opposite sense by Sir J. Romilly in Field v. Brown. I cannot regard that case as a satisfactory authority. It seems to me difficult to reconcile it with the decision of the same learned judge in Dyer v. Dyer (supra). It was apparently based on Choke v. Dealey (col. 675)—a case which was disapproved of by Sir G. Jessel in Steed v. Preece.—p. 746.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court).—Notwithstanding the observations of Sir G. Jessel in Chandler v. Pocock, money which a testator has not got into his own hands, and which he has no right to have in his own hands, and which is held upon trust for investment in land, is, in our opinion, to be treated as real estate, although if he has power to dispose of such money, he can dispose of it either as land or money, as he may think right. The absence of any person after his death to require an investment in land cannot be the real test of what it is in his lifetime. If he says nothing to the contrary, the money must be treated as if it were invested in land, up to and at the time of his death. The older authorities, such as Guidot v. Guidot, and the decision of Fry, J. in Greaves's Settlement Trusts, in re, all show this; and bearing in mind the point which was before the Court in Chandler v. Pocock, we do not feel at all clear that the late M.R. would have held that a devise of real estate would not pass money in the position of that which is here in question. If he really did mean to go that length, we could not agree with him.—p. 957.

WESTBURY, L.C.—That [Hopkins v. Hopkins] was the case of a gift and devise of real estate—an executory limitation, and a direction for the residue of the personal estate to be invested in land, to be settled to the same uses. It was held, and very rightly held, that during the period of time in which the estate was in suspense between the death of the testator and the arising of the executory use, the rents and profits of necessity descended to the heir. And that proceeded upon the rule of law which I have mentioned. But with regard to the personal estate, the decree was governed by an error which then prevailed, and that error was of this nature, holding that personal property directed to be converted into realty was converted for all purposes whatsoever, not only the purposes of the will, but the purposes of ownership in every form, and by every title. And accordingly it was held that that conversion would operate for the benefit of the heir, although the heir claims in default of disposition in consequence of there being no direction given by the will, and cannot by any possibility be made to claim under the will. My lords, that prevalent error was not corrected until the decision of Ackroyd v. Smithson, which decided a point, that of necessity involved this as its consequence, that conversion must be considered in all cases to be directed for the purpose of the will, and is limited by the purposes and exigencies of the will. If therefore the real estate be directed to be sold, with a view to a disposition made by a will, and that disposition fails, although the real estate has de facto been sold, yet the proceeds will retain the quality of real estate for the purpose of ascertaining the ownership, that is the title of the heir; although it is true that when you pay it over to the heir, in the hands of the heir it has the character of money, and no longer the character of real estate. So, in like manner, if money is directed to be invested in land, and the land is disposed of by the will, and the money is so invested, but the disposition fails, the investment thus made for the purposes of the will has no effect in altering the quality of the property; but the property, even in the shape of land, retains its pristine and original quality of personal estate, for the purpose of determining the ownership. These are simple cardinal principles with which we are all familiar. That last principle to which I have adverted had not been followed at the time of the decision of Hopkins v. Hopkins, in 1739, nor was it distinctly recognised until, I think, the year 1780, when Ackroyd v. Smithson was decided. Hopkins v. Hopkins therefore belongs to a period of time when a notion prevailed, the fallacy of which has since been ascertained. And, therefore, Hopkins v. Hopkins could not be cited with any effect in order to influence the determination of the case now at the bar.—p. 666. LORDS CRANWORTH and CHELMSFORD concurred.

Every branch of the Court has in some way or other expressed an opinion upon that decision. What Lord Cottenham thought of it is quite clear, though he was not, in Cogan v. Stephens, called JESSEL, M.R.—If the next-of-kin, having become entitled to a freehold estate, dies, there is no equity to change the freehold estate into anything else on his death: it will go to the devisee of real estate, or to his heir-at-law if he has not devised it, and will pass as real estate. As to that, there is no question, no doubt, no difficulty. No one has suggested any other principle, and even in the case cited—Reynolds v. Godlee—it was admitted that that was the principle, and the only point of difference or distinction suggested was that which appears to me to be opposed to the whole law on this subject, namely, that there was an ultimate trust for the executors, and not for the next-of-kin. As that does not seem to me to have any foundation, and as it appears to me to be opposed to both principle and authority, I do not consider myself bound to follow that decision, and I may say that I am very glad to find I can invoke the very same judgment of the very same judge for the purpose of showing that I am not bound to follow it; for, being referred to a decision [Cogan v. Stephens] of another judge—the M.R.—given several years before, he said that that decision was not obligatory upon him; but that as he thought it consonant with sense and reason and sound law, he chose to follow it. Unfortunately I do not entertain the same view as regards this authority, and therefore I am unable to follow it.—p. 175.

KELLY, C.B.—Chitty v. Parker is so obscurely reported that it is very difficult to collect what were the real terms of the will. Looking at the judgment of the L.C., who had the whole will before him, it is obvious that there was no obligation whatever imposed upon the trustees under that will to convert the real estate into money, but that taking the whole will together, it was only in the event of the personal estate being found insufficient that it might have been necessary, under the particular terms of the will, to convert the real estate into money.—p. 36. Nothing would be more clear than that that would stop the sale; but it turned out that one of them was a married woman, and the deed, therefore, went for nothing.—p. 572.

PEARSON, J.—The rule is this: whenever real estate has been converted into personality, or, according to the doctrine of a Court of equity, is to be treated as having been converted into personality, it must then descend as personality, unless some person who is absolutely entitled to it has shown in some way that he has elected to take it as real estate. Almost anything will be enough to show such an intention, but there must be something. In Gordon, In re, Jessel, M.R. thought that the fact that a person, who was absolutely entitled under the trusts of a will to the proceeds of sale of real estate, had remained in possession and received the rents for nine years, and had taken no steps to have the estate sold, was sufficient evidence of an election to take the property as real estate. In Holden v. Loffs (Aug. 3, 1885) I followed that decision. [The learned judge then proceeds to point out one circumstance which distinguished the case before him from Gordon, In re, and Holden v. Loffs.] The real estate consists of a house which the testator agreed to let for a term of twenty years, expiring in 1887, and the agreement gave the tenant an option to purchase the fee simple of the property at any time before the expiration of the term. The term has not yet expired. There was therefore a very sufficient reason why no sale of the house should take place, either upon the death of the testator, or during the period for which the widow survived the children. I am afraid, therefore, that I cannot, under the circumstances, treat the fact that the widow remained in possession of the property after the death of the children as any evidence one way or the other of an election by her to take the property as real estate.—p. 656.

STIRLING, J.—The question which I have to decide reduces itself to this—whether a married woman, tenant on the rolls of copyholds, can by deed acknowledged under the Fines and Recoveries Act effectually declare herself a trustee of those copyholds. The answer depends on sect. 77 of the Act. . . . The first question which arises on this enactment is whether a declaration of trust is a disposition. . . . A declaration of trust on the part of a feme sole, whereby she effectually parts with the entire equitable interest in property of which she remains legal owner, certainly appears to me to be a disposition in equity of that property. That is borne out by the decision of Lord Hatherley in Pride v. Bubb. . . . It was said, however, that the contrary was decided in Green v. Paterson, which is a decision binding upon me. . . . A mere declaration of trust, of course, could not pass a legal estate, and consequently I entirely agree, if I may be allowed to say so, in the decision of the C. A. in Green v. Paterson, that a mere declaration of trust could not bar an estate tail. The language of Fry, L.J. might, no doubt, admit of a wider meaning, and that is what is relied upon. He says: "In the first place, the statute requires that the instrument to bar the estate tail shall be a disposition, and I find in this case nothing like a disposition. It is a mere declaration of trust by the lady." Those words, taken literally, would seem to indicate an opinion that a mere declaration of trust was not a sufficient disposition within the Fines and Recoveries Act; but I think that they ought to be read as applying only to the point then actually calling for decision, and not as intended to affect the construction of sect. 77, which was not then under consideration by the Court, and all the more so as I observe that Pride v. Bubb was not cited to the Court in the argument. In sect. 77 I find nothing which requires the disposition to be made by such an assurance as is required by sect. 40.—pp. 88–90.

MORRIS, J.—I think it is clear that when he [i.e., the person to whom the enfranchisement was made] is the tenant in tail in possession the enfranchisement has the effect of barring the entail. Challoner v. Marshall and Dunn v. Green seem to me clear authorities on the point, and the criticisms which have been made on them, founded on reports which are not very clear, would not justify me in departing from them, especially as they are of such long standing. The law is clearly laid down in that way in Scriven on Copyholds (4th ed.), p. 555, and also in Watkins on Copyholds, and the only doubt which has been thrown upon it is in the notes by Mr. Coventry to Watkins on Copyholds (4th ed.), p. 236. Mr. Coventry was a conveyancer of great experience; but he only suggests a doubt, and I cannot, upon the authority of those notes, overrule the law laid down in Challoner v. Marshall and Dunn v. Green. In Challoner v. Marshall, though the deed of enfranchisement was to the tenant for life, he did not dispose of the property by his will, but it descended to a person who was both his heir of the freehold interest and also the tenant in tail under the limitations in tail of the copyhold interest; and therefore the effect was in substance the same as if the enfranchisement had been made directly to the tenant in tail. It is said that the note to Parker v. Turner shows that the decision there was based upon the operation of a fine; but I think the note only shows that there was another ground besides the merger of the copyhold interest in the freehold on which the decision might have been supported. I must follow the other cases.—p. 754.

ESHER, M.R.—The only remaining question is whether, assuming the heriot to be a customary heriot, the property in the beast passes so that the lord can seize it wherever it is. It is a question of authority, as it seems to me. We have the proposition laid down in distinct terms in Parker v. Gage. . . . We have the same proposition in Watkins on Copyholds (vol. ii. p. 168, 4th ed. 1825), and we have it again equally clearly laid down in the note to Lanyon v. Verne [(1667) 2 Wms. Saund. 168 b.]. It is impossible to decide the question contrary to these authorities, when there is no authority for the contrary proposition. I think, therefore, that Wills, J. was in the result right in deciding that the lord of the manor had the right to seize the beast, although it was not within the manor.—p. 51.

FENTREDEEN, C.J. (for the Court).—The proper mode of estimating the fine is to take, for the second life, half the sum taken for the first; for the third, half the sum taken for the second; and for the fourth, half that which is taken for the third, and so on. . . . The rule that we have laid down appears to have been the rule approved of in Taylor v. Penbrooke, and is referred in Bath (Earl) v. Abney, though it is not very accurately stated either in the margin of the reports or in Watkins's Treatise on Copyholds [vol. i. 2nd ed., p. 483]. There is an inaccurate use of the word "sequitur." It is said that the fine for two lives is the sequitur of that taken for one, and so far it is correct; and that the fine for three is the sequitur of that taken for two, which is incorrect. The meaning is plain enough, that the sum taken for the third life is the sequitur of that taken for the second.—p. 361.

KAY, L.J.—Some reliance has been placed upon words used by me in Liddard and Jackson's and Broadley's Contract, in re. In that case a point of this kind arose more than seventy years after the last intimation on the Court Rolls of the property in question being copyhold. During those seventy years it had been dealt with by the persons in possession conveying it as freehold land, with some exceptions that did not seem to me to be material. The case was decided upon the ground that after so long a time, and after the dealings with the property during those seventy years, it must be presumed against the lord that there had been an enfranchisement. Incidentally the other question was raised, and in the report, which I have no doubt is perfectly accurate, the language that I appear to have used is thus stated at p. 257: ". . . Copyholds are within the Act of Will. 4, being expressly mentioned in the interpretation clause (sect. 1), and therefore an entry as to copyholds is one of the things which the Act says must be made within the twenty years. Therefore, if that point arises in the present case, I should be inclined to hold that such an entry could not be made on land after the lapse of seventy years, but that the lord was bound long before that time had elapsed to make proclamation and seize quousque if he meant to do so at all." That point has been most ably argued in the case before us, and I have had an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, and I have now come to a different conclusion, and for this reason. The Statute of 8 & 4 Will. 4, which has now to be read with the later Act, that has altered the time from twenty to twelve years, provides that "land" in the Act shall include copyholds, and the effect of sect. 9 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57 is that copyholds are included in the word "land" in that Act as in the previous one. . . . Until such refusal [by the tenant to come in] there is no forfeiture; and therefore, upon further consideration, I have come to the conclusion that until such refusal there is no right of entry or right of action on the part of the lord to seize the land *quovisq*ue in order to compel the tenant to come in to be admitted. . . . It was decided in Froswell v. Welch, some 270 years ago, that there may be an implied admittance by the lord of a person who is entitled to be admitted to a copyhold tenement, by treating him as a copyhold tenant in various ways, and amongst others by receiving the quit-rent from him. . . . I take the summary of the law from Rolfe's Abridgment (Copyholds), p. 505, pl. x: "If a copyholder surrenders to the use of another, and the lord having knowledge of that accepts the rent of the certain que une out of Court, that is an admittance in law." That statement of the decision in Froswell v. Welch has been found in all the principal text-books from that time to the present, and I agree that even if upon a careful consideration of that case it should be found that the statement is not borne out by the authority cited in support of it, still it would be wrong for any Court after such a lapse of time to treat it as otherwise than the true effect of that decision. Froswell v. Welch is reported in various reports. The reports do not altogether agree, for some seem to state the doctrine in rather wider terms than others do. I think the report most relied on by those who are contending now that there was an implied admittance is that in Pulstrode; but the summary of them all is in Rolfe's Abridgment in the words I have read, and I accept that as being the law.—pp. 432—435.

ROMER, J.—Before Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Parr it was supposed by some that, in a case like the present, the statutes ran from the time when the lord might have perfected the right to seize after he knew of the death of the last admitted tenant; but in that case it was decided by the C. A. that the time ran only from the time when the tenant who ought to take admittance refused to come in after the lord had made the necessary three proclamations, or given notice to the tenant to come in. . . . I think that when Key, L.J. spoke of neglect on the part of the tenant in coming in, he meant such a neglect as amounted to a refusal—something that put the lord at arm's length, and fairly gave him notice that the tenant was challenging his right as lord. And, if I may respectfully say so, there are cogent grounds for this. It ought not to be that a lord should be bound to seize, or be bound to bring an action in a case where the tenant in no way challenges the lord's rights, and the lord has no desire to seize or to bring a hostile action against the tenant.—p. 798.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is settled law, and was so laid down in Leeds (Duke) v. Strafford (Earl) that it is the duty of a copyhold tenant to preserve the boundaries of his lands. . . . It was incidentally settled in that case that in a suit to ascertain the boundaries, if the rent-charge were in arrear, the Court of Chancery would compel payment; it would enforce the legal rights of the lord.—p. 533.

QUAIN, J.—Reade v. Conquest, and some dicta of Erle, C.J. and Lord Hatherley [Tinsley v. Lacy], have been cited to us to the effect that it is possible for a man who writes a novel and then dramatises it, although he may keep that drama in his desk and never print it or publish it, to prevent all other persons from dramatising the novel. I am not aware of any authority for that, and those dicta were not in the least necessary for the decision of the cases in which they were uttered, especially that of Lord Hatherley, where he had only to decide the question of book copyright, and not of dramatic copyright at all (p. 176). . . . This case differs from the second case of Read v. Conquest in the very important fact that here the novel was written first, and in that case it was written second.—p. 177.

In Toole v. Young the distinction was pointed out between such a case as Read v. Conquest and the case of a defendant dramatising a novel published by the plaintiff before his, the plaintiff's, dramatic version of it.—p. 765.

STIRLING, J.—In the early cases of Coleman v. Wathen and Murray v. Elliston (which established that the representation in public of a drama previously printed and published was not an infringement of the author's copyright), the point raised in the present action could hardly have arisen, for they were decided at a time when the statutes in force conferred only the exclusive right of printing. It is unlikely that any copies (other than manuscripts) were used for the purpose of the representation of the plays which were the subject of those actions; and such manuscript copies would not have been infringements of the author's rights. . . . That case (Read v. Conquest), therefore, seems to me to have been decided on the ground that the plaintiff's statutory right of multiplying copies of his book was not infringed.—pp. 81, 82.

HALL, V.-C.—It was also contended that this work is not entitled to any protection having regard to its character; that it is, in fact, a mere advertisement, and that an advertisement is not, on the authority of Cobbett v. Woodward, entitled to protection. The decision in that case turned entirely on the circumstances which existed in it. It was a catalogue of articles which were being offered for sale. But it does not appear that Hotten v. Arthur was mentioned to the M.R., and whether, if it had been, his lordship's decision would have been different, it is difficult to say; but certainly it was decided in Hotten v. Arthur that a catalogue may under certain circumstances be protected by injunction.—p. 626.

JESSEL, M.R.—The case which has done all the mischief is Cobbett v. Woodward. The late M.R. there says: "But at the last it always comes round to this, that in fact there is no copyright in an advertisement. If you copy the advertisement of another you do him no wrong, unless in so doing you lead the public to believe that you sell the articles of the person whose advertisement you copy." I think that this is not the law. I am not aware that the use to which a proprietor puts his book makes any difference in his rights. His copyright gives him the exclusive right of multiplying copies, and he may use them as he pleases. I think, therefore, that Cobbett v. Woodward will not bear legal examination. There are two cases tending in the opposite direction to Cobbett v. Woodward, namely, Hotten v. Arthur and Grace v. Newman. It is true that in Hotten v. Arthur there was considerable literary work in the ordinary sense of the term—the publication was more than a mere catalogue—still its primary object was that of an advertisement to promote the plaintiff's trade. The weight of authority, then, is against the doctrine that there cannot be copyright in a book issued as an advertisement, and I cannot see any principle in support of that doctrine.—p. 72.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I should have felt no difficulty in this case were it not for the decision in Cobbett v. Woodward. If that case were reconcilable with the other cases on the subject I should be slow to overrule it, but it appears to me difficult to reconcile it with the other cases, especially Bogue v. Houlston. [JESSEL, M.R. (having examined the record in Bogue v. Houlston, which had been sent for during the argument) said: "I find that the bill did not claim copyright in any letterpress, and did not state that there were any other stories than 'Reynard the Fox' in the plaintiff's book." That case, then, is very strong, for it is a decision that there may be copyright in a set of engravings forming part of a book, though there is none in the letterpress; and that governs this case, for copyright in the engravings could not be obtained by binding them up with something else in which there was no copyright.—ib.]

KEKEWICH, J.—The headline [Grace v. Newman], which I have taken care to verify by the V.-C.'s judgment, is: "Plaintiff, a cemetery stone mason, employed and remunerated a person to collect monumental designs, and published a book containing sketches of such designs, with scarcely any letterpress:—Held, that the plaintiff had copyright in the book, and was entitled to an injunction." If my view is right, Mr. Wesley Petty never employed or remunerated any one. He did in his character of agent, but not otherwise; and assuming him therefore to have been the author of the letterpress, the rest of the book—that is to say, the figures—were not done for him, they were done for somebody else; and it seems to me monstrous to suppose—and I am sure Grace v. Newman does not support the hypothesis—that a man in protecting his copyright in letterpress, supposing him to be entitled to it, can thereby protect an alleged copyright in works of art which are introduced into the letterpress, they being the works of other persons, the copyright of which is vested in those other persons, or at any rate in strangers to the literary author.—p. 213.

GIPFARD, L.J.—Lord Cranworth, in Jefferys v. Boosey (post, col. 706), said that the true definition of "copyright" is the sole right of multiplying copies. That, of course, means that you must not copy with or without colourable alterations. That is a general definition of copyright. Then with respect to the latter cases, I may observe that in Kelly v. Morris, as well as in Morris v. Ashbee, there was direct copying. Not only were the slips used for the purpose of canvassing, but the course pursued was this: when a slip was presented to the person who was canvassed, he was asked whether he authorised that particular entry: they proceeded to get his authority for its insertion, and the entry was copied in the book. In Kelly v. Morris, the present L.C. says: "I think there must be an injunction . . . trouble in getting his information." If this passage goes further than what I take it to mean, I cannot doubt that it goes beyond what the law authorises, and beyond the decision of the L.C. and myself in the late case of Pike v. Nicholas. It does not mean that he may not look into the book for the purpose of ascertaining where a particular person lived, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was worth his while to call upon that person or not, but it means that he may not take that particular slip and show that to the person and get his authority as to putting that particular slip in. Then the L.C. goes on—it does not rest there: "The defendant, from his description of the way . . . the trouble to make a single inquiry." I understand that judgment to rest entirely upon the facts, and I am quite satisfied from what the L.C. said in Pike v. Nicholas, that it was never his intention to say a person may not look at the directory for the purpose of directing him where to call; but what he meant was, that he must not take the passage of the directory, and go and see whether it happens to be accurate, and, if it is accurate, bodily copy the passage into his directory. With respect to my own judgment in Morris v. Ashbee, what I said was this: "The plaintiff incurred the labour. . . . I say clearly not." Therefore it is quite clear in both those cases the parties had gone very far beyond anything stated in the thirteenth and sixteenth paragraphs of Mr. W.'s affidavit. They had virtually and bodily copied from the book—they had copied from the very slip—and all they had done was to take the slip and verify it, and nothing else.—p. 284.

LUSH, L.J.—Before I consider this question I will notice the decision in Weldon v. Dicks, which was pressed upon us by the plaintiff's counsel as being precisely in point. In that case a series of books had been published by the plaintiff. One work in that series was intitled "Trial and Triumph." The defendant subsequently published in two magazines, and afterwards in a separate volume, an entirely different book, but with the same title, "Trial and Triumph." The plaintiff brought an action and claimed an injunction, alleging in his statement of claim that the defendant had published and continued to publish his work with the intention of inducing the public to believe, and he had in fact induced persons to believe, that the book so published by him was identical with that published and about to be re-published by the plaintiff. That was an allegation of a common law fraud, and although the learned V.-C. did not explicitly put his judgment on that allegation, I cannot help thinking that it influenced his mind from beginning to end, and that he did not distinguish between a violation of a common law right and an infringement of copyright. But I observe that in the latter part of his judgment he says, "all the witnesses agree that the title of a book is a material part of the book, it is a valuable part of it, and the case is illustrated by a reference to Mr. Thackeray's work of Vanity Fair. Would any one be entitled to publish a book called Vanity Fair, leaving out the author's name? A person buying the cheap edition would expect to get Thackeray's work, and what a fraud it would be if he had got some spurious thing which was not worth reading." I cannot help thinking that this is the key to the whole judgment, and that what the learned V.-C. has in his mind was that the allegation was proved that the title was adopted for the very purpose of inducing persons to believe that the book was the same book as that which belonged to the plaintiff. If so, the case is no authority whatever on the present point, which, as I said before, turns on the simple question whether there can be copyright in the title "Splendid Misery," and I am clearly of opinion that there cannot.—p. 92.

LORD DAVEY.—A sheet of letterpress is a book within the meaning of the [Copyright] Act; and notwithstanding the decision of Malins, V.-C., in *Cox v. NORTH, J.—I take it that these meetings were held under circumstances in which reporters were invited to attend for the purpose of publishing the speeches that they heard. If that is so, they were intended to be made public, and the case is quite different from those of Abernethy v. Hutchinson, Nicola v. Pitman, and Caird v. Sims (supra). . . . The speaker himself makes no claim at all. . . . [His lordship referred to Butterworth v. Robinson (supra, col. 690), and after stating the facts continued.] That clearly was a case in which the report of what the reporter heard in Court was treated as a matter in respect of which he had copyright. No doubt to some extent a legal report might be an abridgment, but it is rather singular that what in particular might be abridged and put very neatly—the speeches and arguments of counsel—seems to have been left out altogether. Again, in Street v. Mawham the Legal Observer had printed cases identical with reports in the Jurist. Some of the cases had come from an independent source, and as to those there could be no copyright in the plaintiff, but as to the rest the copyright was claimed, and the V.-C. granted an injunction. [His lordship referred to certain American authorities, and after discussing Leslie v. Young, continued.] There the plaintiff had published certain time-tables and so on in connection with Perth, which it was alleged the defendant had copied. The time-tables and the times for the trains to start were, of course, taken both by the plaintiff and the defendant in the action from the tables issued to the public by the railway companies. As to this, it was held that as far as the plaintiff had only taken the contents of the time-tables from the public time-tables, he could not by printing them over again have any copyright in them. But he had done more. He had also collected and given various excursions which were recommended to travellers, and in the report of that case in the House of Lords it is pointed out why the distinction is drawn. . . . That was a case, therefore, where the common material did not itself give a right of copyright, but when it was made the basis of giving to the public something that was not found in the tables themselves it was held it might be so. In the case before me there is, as I say, no copying at all; what is done is the taking down what is spoken, and that seems to me for this purpose to be an original thing and not a copy.—pp. 738–740.

Chappell v. Boosey (1882) 51 L. J. Ch. 625; 21 Ch. D. 232; 46 L. T. 854; 30 W. R. 733.

NORTH, J.—In that case [Cumberland v. Planché] the piece had been already printed and published, and therefore, if the contention of the present defendant is sound, the acting right, which was the subject of the decision, had no existence in fact. This fact does not seem to have occurred to Sir F. Pollock or Sir J. Scarlett, who argued the case, or to any of the four judges who decided it. . . . With respect to the statement in the 16th article of the Digest, that a "dramatic piece or musical composition published as a book may (it seems probable) be publicly represented without the consent of the author or his assigns," I confess my inability to agree with it. It is stated in a footnote by the learned author of the Digest, that the only authority he has been able to find on the point is that of Murray v. Elliston (supra, col. 688), which seems to imply the proposition contained in the article. But that case was decided in 1822, many years before the passing of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, which Act was the first to create an acting right, and was intended to alter and amend the law which existed when Murray v. Elliston was decided. If that case had been decided after the Act instead of before, the decision must have been the other way, unless, indeed, it had been held that the alterations made in adapting the piece for the stage had rendered it a new work, in which case it would not have been any authority for the proposition contained in art. 16.—p. 628.

Both of these cases were decided, one long before, and the other just before, the passing of the Act of Will. 4 [3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15]; therefore they can give us no light into the precise sense in which the words y have been used in that statute.—p. 398.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am aware that there are inter dicta of the present M.R. which go very far beyond the definition of "a place of dramatic entertainment" proposed in Russell v. Smith. The M.R., in Wall v. Taylor, certainly does say, I understand him, that performing a dramatic piece for the amusement of other persons makes a place where it is performed a place of dramatic entertainment, which would include the case of song sung for the amusement of friends in a singing room. The M.R., whom I have contended during the argument, thinks that some of his expressions went further than he is now disposed to go, but if his words are taken in their full sense it will follow that this piece was performed under circumstances which bring it within the earlier statute. I have already stated my reasons for taking the opposite view, and I think Russell v. Smith is a sufficient authority to support my opinion.—p. 83.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—Planché v. Braham was very much pressed upon the attention of this House, but, though the portion there taken was minute, it must be remembered that it consisted of songs, the words of which were adopted, without licence (in preference to those which had been otherwise published) by a celebrated singer, and probably much of the value of the work might be due to its association with that singer's name. These songs would perhaps be one of the chief points of the drama's success, and therefore if wrongly introduced in the defendant's piece might materially damage the value of the plaintiff's drama.—p. 549.

[It was argued that, there being a variation between the defendants' pattern and that of the plaintiff, the defendants had therefore not copied the thing which the plaintiff had chosen to register, and the only thing for which he was entitled to protection; and that this was clearly the opinion of the learned lords who decided the case. (See L. R. 2 H. L. 384, 387, 388, 390)]

HATHERLEY, L.C.—I think this is really a very idle contention. It seems to me an attempt to give a meaning to some words used in the H. L. totally opposite to anything that was intended by the noble lords who used those words. . . . I imagine that the observations made by some of the learned lords, and relied upon by the defendants, were intended to say merely that the design could be protected only as it was represented; and the learned lords considered that the question whether there was any difference in the effect would be left to the jury. Their lordships seem to have meant that the designer is not bound, as in a patent case, to distinguish the new from the old, and is allowed to register his pattern without distinguishing what is new from what is old; but if he chooses to put it in that way, it will not be protected as against the public in case they choose to use any portion in any manner substantially differing from the registered design.—p. 419.

Newton v. Cowie (1827) 4 Bing. 234; 12 Moore 457; 5 L. J. (O.S.) C. P. 159; 29 R. R. 541.

BEST, C.J.—The first case is Blackwell v. Harper, 2 Atkyns 92, better reported in 1 Barnardiston 210. In that case the time was not mentioned when the plaintiff first published. The chancellor was of opinion, "that the words of the Act requiring the insertion of the dates were directory only, and not descriptive, and, therefore, the day is only necessary to be inserted on prints where the penalty of the Act is intended to be taken advantage of." But in Barnardiston this important passage is added: "That as the circumstance of inserting the day was not complied with, he would grant an injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing the prints for the future, but would not direct on account of the profits of those already published." And then, at the close of his judgment, he is represented to say, "it is matter of doubt whether the clause ought to be construed directory or descriptive." If his lordship was right that the plaintiff was not entitled to an account for by-gone profits, why is this plaintiff entitled to recover damages for a by-gone injury? The authority, therefore, is rather in favour of the objection taken against it. The chancellor, indeed, seems influenced by the decision of Baldard v. Walker [1739], which, as cited in Blackwell v. Harper, and it is not to be found elsewhere, was a decision on the 8 Anne, c. 19, and related to a book which had not been entered at Stationers' Hall. But the words of that Act are different from those of the Acts relating to prints. The words of the statute of Anne are, "that nothing in this Act shall be construed to subject any bookseller to forfeitures by reason of the printing any book, unless the title of the copy shall be registered with the Stationers' Company." Consequently, no forfeitures could be incurred unless where a proper entry had been made at Stationers' Hall. But in the 8 Geo 2, the same clause which gives the proprietor the monopoly, requires him to engrave on his plate the date of publication: . . . Beckford v. Hood (supra, col. 688) was an action on the case for pirating a book. The work was not entered at Stationers' Hall, and the question was whether an action on the case could be maintained for the injury to the plaintiff's right, or whether he must sue for the penalties given by the statute? That was the only question that Lord Kenyon and the other judges appear to have considered. Lord Kenyon said the entry at Stationers' Hall was to be a warning not to incur penalties. The decision, however, was on a different statute, and calling on another not to injure rights is a different thing from suing for forfeitures.—pp. 241—243.

KEKEWICH, J.—I have no doubt on the evidence that the son, though according to his own account perfectly competent to take a photograph himself, as regards this particular portrait, acted as his father's agent, the father being the director and the principal agent throughout. It seems to me that that makes him the author of the portrait directly within such definition as is to be found in Nottage v. Jackson, which relates to the photograph of the team of Australian cricketers taken at Kennington Oval in 1882; and the father appears to be outside the criticism of the M.R. and the L.J.J. there, which went to show that an agent is not an author within sect. 1 of the Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), and that a principal cannot be an author unless he is the active principal. I have also looked at . . . Kenrick v. Lawrence, in which Nottage v. Jackson has been commented upon. I think, having in view those cases, the right conclusion is that Mr. Melville, senior, is the author of the photograph.—p. 42.

LORD WATSON.—The language of Bayley, J. in West v. Francis comes nearer to a definition of what constitutes copying than anything which is to be found in the books. It runs thus: "A copy is that which comes so near to the original as to give to every person seeing it the idea created by the original." The learned judge was construing for the purposes of the case before him, the provisions of 17 Geo. 3, c. 57, which differ in expression from the enactments of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 68, and contain no reference to reproducing the design of the protected work. As I read the later statute, with which we have to deal in this case, the idea created by a picture or drawing does not necessarily form an element in the original work or its design which is protected by copyright. . . . In all cases where the alleged invasion is not a mere copy, the statute makes it imperative to consider how far there is an identity of design.—p. 84.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I cannot think or bring myself to decide that the perforated sheet is a copy of a sheet of music within the meaning of the Copyright Act. . . . Music appeals to the ear, but a sheet of music appeals to the eye, and the observation of Bayley, J. in West v. Francis is applicable not only to engravings but to all kinds of books, and the Copyright Act treats a sheet of music as it treats a book.—p. 69.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—Great reliance was placed by the appellants' counsel on the decision of the H. L. in Jefferys v. Boosey, reversing a unanimous decision of the Court of Ex. Ch., in which I had concurred. That high tribunal must, of course, be considered as having decided rightly; but the ratio decidendi was merely that an absolute assignment, executed abroad, of all an author's copyright in a musical composition, gave no title to the assignee beyond the territory or the state in which the assignment was executed; and this is no authority for saying that the assignee could not have maintained an action in England for an injury to the copyright within the limits of that territory.—p. 707.

CAIRNS, L.C.—That case [Jefferys v. Boosey] was decided, not upon the present Copyright Act, but upon the old Copyright Act of Queen Anne. On the construction of that Act six of the learned judges who advised your lordships were of opinion that a foreigner living at Milan, and composing a literary work there, could convey a title of copyright by assignment, under which his assignee, publishing here, was entitled to protection. Four of the learned judges were of a different opinion; and your lordships unanimously held, that the foreigner in that case could not give a title of copyright; and this must be taken to be the construction and effect of the statute of Anne. But it is impossible not to see that the ratio decidendi in that case proceeded mainly, if not exclusively, on the wording of the preamble of the statute of Anne, and on a consideration of the general character and scope of the legislature of Great Britain at that period. The present statute has repealed that Act, and professes to aim at affording greater encouragement to the production of literary works of lasting benefit to the world; and accepting the decision of this House as to the construction of the statute of Anne, it is, I think impossible not to see that the present statute would be incompatible with a policy so narrow as that expressed in the statute of Anne.—p. 458.

COTTON, L.J.—In that case [Jefferys v. Boosey] there was an attempt to assign a copyright so far only as it related to one particular portion of the Queen's dominions and not to the rest, and what Lord St. Leonards says is that that cannot be done. The only copyright there which could be assigned was a copyright effectual over all the Queen's dominions, and not simply over a limited portion of them, and it could not be split up in the way there attempted. That is quite different from the present case. Section 18 [of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45] points out that there may be two separate copyrights on the same work, a copyright in respect of publication of the articles in the paper, and copyright in respect of their publication in a separate book. Here what is sought to be protected is only this article in the paper, and all that is required by the Act, in my opinion, is, that before the proprietor of the newspaper can sue he shall register his newspaper, not the copyright in this particular article.—p. 434.

LORD BLACKBURN.—It is as well to state what really was the question in Wood v. Boosey, for the case seems to me to have been misunderstood. Otto Nicolai had composed an opera and caused it to be performed at Berlin on the 9th of March, 1849. His inchoate rights to a monopoly in this country were exactly the same as those of Offenbach in the present case. The time prescribed by the Order in Council with regard to Prussia is twelve months, that prescribed by the Order in Council with regard to France is three months, that was the only difference. Otto Nicolai died within the twelve months, and neither he nor his representatives did anything to render his rights in this country perfect before the end of the twelve months, and consequently by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 12, s. 19, neither he nor his assigns could after that acquire in this country any rights as to the music first represented in Berlin. But on the 1st of September, 1851, more than twelve months after Nicolai's death, his personal representatives published in Berlin the music of the opera arranged for the pianoforte, and on the 4th October made an entry in the registry of the opera pianoforte score, stating the composer to be Otto Nicolai. The action was for infringing the right to multiply copies of this pianoforte score. The plaintiffs had to maintain two positions, first, that the pianoforte score contained an original composition not published at Berlin till within twelve months before the 4th October, 1851; and secondly, that the composer of that original composition was Nicolai, who had been dead more than twelve months before the 4th October, 1851, and had in March, 1849, represented at Berlin the whole opera as he composed it. It was certainly very difficult to maintain both positions; and unless he could maintain both the plaintiff was rightly non-suited. The nonsuit was upheld on the ground that, though he had made out his first position, he had failed in making out his second. What I understand to have been proved in that case was that in an opera the tunes and the harmonies and accompaniments are the composition of the original composer, in that case Nicolai, in this Offenbach, but that to bring out these tunes and harmonies and the effect as far as possible of the accompaniment on any particular instrument or instruments, further work is required. The person who prepares the original score for the performance on the stage by many instruments and by the voices of many singers writes down what notes are to be played on each of the instruments and what notes are to be sung by the different voices; and by that means it is shown what instruments or voices are to play or sing the tune and what are to produce the harmony and play the accompaniment in a full orchestra and singers. But if the same tunes and harmonies are to be performed on the pianoforte, or sung by voices accompanied by the pianoforte alone, something more is required. It must be indicated what notes are to be played on the pianoforte so as to give the harmony and tune and effect—not precisely the accompaniment as it would be brought out by the full orchestra, for that, as I understand my brother Bramwell, is impossible—but to give the harmony and tune as near to that effect as the arranger for the piano can contrive. And that arrangement, though it adopts the harmony and tune, is an original composition, or at least a new work.—p. 704.

KENNEDY, J.—What he [Cockburn, C.J.] there said was: "I must say that the result of the discussion has been to cause me very strongly to incline to the opinion that sect. 24 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, which requires that the proprietor shall be registered before he shall be entitled to bring an action for the infringement of his copyright, does not apply to the case of an assignee to whom the proprietorship is assigned." Later on in his judgment the C.J. states his reasons, the principal of which appears to be the chance of an injustice to the assignee, who, in the words of the judgment, has "no power under the statute, either through the means of this Court or any other means that I can see, to enforce the registration of an entry by way of assignment under sect. 13." As the assignee, who by virtue of the assignment has got the proprietorship, if the entry of the assignment is not made under sect. 13, is not prevented, as I understand the Act, from registering himself as proprietor, I am unable to perceive the reality of the suggested danger of injustice. The other members of the Court decided not to express any opinion on the subject. Blackburn, J. says that he had at first thought the objection fatal to the plaintiff's case, "but after hearing the argument my opinion is much shaken, and I would not support the nonsuit on that ground without further time for consideration." Mellor and Lush, J.J. preferred to express no opinion on the point. In the later case of Tuck v. Canton, which was not, I think, referred to in the argument, a similar point was raised under the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68). There again the point was not decided, and Mathew, J. said, "I do not think it necessary to deal with the other questions that have been suggested, whether or not there is a necessity for registering any assignment, assuming that there was a registration of the original copyright. That is a difficult question, and one that I should take further time to consider, if I thought it necessary to decide it for the purposes of this case." It seems to me that I am now called upon, to the best of my judgment, to decide the point. I have come to the conclusion, although—in the face of judicial doubt, and of the opinion of Cockburn, C.J.—with considerable hesitation, which I have already stated—namely, that, to maintain an action for infringement, an assignee of a copyright must be registered.—p. 407.

CHITTY, J.—The decision in Moul v. Groenings, if authority be wanted, shows that "interests" in the proviso [in sect. 6 of the International Copyright Act, 1886] has a more extended meaning than "rights." Some attempt was made by one of the plaintiff's counsel to use the judgment in that case for the purpose of cutting down the meaning of the word "interests" to "capital embarked," or in some other way. But the judgment did nothing of the kind. What was decided was that the bandmaster had an interest, and was protected.—p. 73.

CHARLES, J.—That case [Lauri v. Renad], however, merely decides that the language of sect. 6 [Copyright Act, 1886] does not revive an already extinguished right. It does not recreate an expired copyright—copyright in a translation which had come to an end before the Act of 1886 came into operation. There is not, either in the language of the judgments or in the decision itself, anything inconsistent with the sion at which I have arrived. . . . I find the learned judge [Stirling, J. in Fishburn v. Hollingshead] prefaces his elaborate examination of the Copyright Acts by observing first from the point of view he took of the case, but he is unnecessary to decide the question of registration under the [English Copyright Act of 1862 was required, and, secondly, he reserves to himself full liberty to reconsider his opinion at the trial of the action—a which, in fact, never took place, the contrary injunction having been made perpetual assent.—p. 350.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now first of all, as regards authority, the strongest case in favour of the plaintiffs is certainly Reg. v. Sheffield (Mayor). I by no means say that that case is not, in my opinion, rightly decided, or that I have any cause for criticising it adversely; but it does not go to the extent contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs. Now I come to a case which does not appear to have been cited (and I am sorry it was not) in Reg. v. Sheffield (Mayor). It is a case which of course, as far as I am concerned, is of higher authority than the judgment of the Q. B., because it is a judgment of the L.C. It is the well-known case of Bright v. North. It is, therefore, a decision that a proposed interference by Act of Parliament with the powers of the commissioners, and with their duties, is such an interference as fairly entitles them to appear before a committee of either House to oppose the bill. When we come to look at the case which was very much commented on in Reg. v. Sheffield (Mayor), namely, Att.-Gen. v. Wigan Corporation, whatever view we may take of the construction put by Wood, V.-C. upon the Act of Parliament, we shall see that he simply founds his decision on Bright v. North, and nothing else; he does not decide at all on the notion of injury to property, he reasons in a way which has not been satisfactory to the judges of the Q. B., and, if I may humbly say so, is not altogether satisfactory to me. He held that the Act gives the corporation power to restrain nuisances generally, and having found that power and the duty to stop nuisances generally, he says they have a plain duty of taking care there shall be no nuisance in the town. Now, assuming he is right so far, then I think there is no possible fault to be found with his judgment; the real difficulty in the judgment is that you cannot find the power in the Act without giving to the restricted words of the section which he commented on a very much larger meaning than they fairly bear; that really is the criticism on the judgment by the Court of Q. B. or at least by three of the judges of that Court. But if you once arrive at the same conclusion as the V.-C. did as to the true construction of the section, namely, that there was the power to abate nuisance generally and the duty to prevent it, I think his reasoning is, as he says it is, exactly in accordance with Bright v. North. It seems to me, looking at the authorities, that . . . if there is an attack by proposed private legislation on the rights, privileges and duties of a corporation, that corporation is entitled to defend itself before Parliament.—pp. 157—160.

LORD DAVEY.—This case, in my opinion, differs in essential particulars from the Brecon Case. In that case the question was whether the corporation could pay the expenses of resisting an attack upon their corporate privileges and duties out of the borough fund. In this case it is not disputed that the corporation of Leith might lawfully defend themselves against any attack upon their existence out of their proper funds. . . . Therefore, the question is whether the corporation of Leith can lawfully charge the expenses of resisting the bill of the corporation of Edinburgh on the rates leviable by them under the Public Health Act, which they administer for the purposes of the Act independently of their ordinary rights, privileges, and duties. I am of opinion that they cannot, and therefore I concur in the judgment which has been proposed.—p. 114.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The rule of law is clear that prima facie and for general purposes a corporation can only contract under seal, for the proper legal mode of authenticating the act of a corporation is by means of its seal. On this rule, however, certain exceptions have been engrafted. The principle that governs these exceptions is conveniently stated in Church v. Imperial Gas Light Co. . . . which statement is adopted . . . in Ludlow Corporation v. Charlton.—p. 94.

BLACKBURN, J.—Clarke v. Cuckfield Union is its facts undistinguishable from the present case. We are aware that very high authorities are questioned the soundness of that decision, and, as pointed out in the judgment in that case, there are prior decisions in the Court of Ex. which are difficult to reconcile with it. We think, however, that, as far as it extends to such a case as the present at least, the case was rightly decided; there may be cases in which the circumstances are different from those in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union and the present case, and which would still be governed by the principles laid down in the decisions in the Ex.; those we leave to be decided when they arise; but, so far as those prior decisions are inconsistent with the decision in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, we prefer to follow the authority of Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, which we think founded on justice and convenience.—p. 627.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—In Nicholson v. Bradfield Union, Blackburn, J. entertained great doubt, but followed the decision in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union. The amount, it must be recollected, which it was sought to recover against the defendants was small, only 26l. 10s. I doubt, therefore, whether that case would come within the rule that orders for things of small amount may be given by corporations, if they are used for matters of urgency or necessity, without the contract being under seal. The action was for coals sold and delivered, to which the defendants set up as their defence that the contract with the defendants, a corporation, was not under seal. . . . Again, in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union. I may point out that the contract was executed and the amount sued for small—it was only 14l. 16s. I would make a remark on Haigh v. North Bierley Union. I think that Erle, J. does not rest his decision on the ground merely that the work had been done, but he considered that the retainer of the plaintiff to investigate the accounts of the union and to do the work would have been a binding engagement.—p. 54. BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ. concurred.

WIGHTMAN, J. adhered to the opinion he expressed in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union.

ERLE, J.—There is more difficulty in reconciling some of the other decisions in the Ex. with this principle [that the contract was made for a purpose directly connected with the object of the incorporation]; and Diggle v. London and Blackwall Ry. [supra, col. 715] may, perhaps, be in direct conflict with it. Perhaps it may be distinguished on the ground that the contract there was for the purpose of changing the railway from a line worked by stationary engines to a line for locomotives, and therefore in its nature unique, and such as could occur only once in the lifetime of the corporation; unless it can be distinguished on that ground the case is in conflict with other authorities. I do not pretend to overrule the decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction; but, if Diggle v. London and Blackwall Ry. is in conflict with the authorities laying down this principle, I adhere to them, and not to it.—p. 416.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—A corporation, by common law, could only bind itself by contract under the common seal (a necessary incident by the common law to all such corporations), except in some slight matters of service. The Court of Q. B. has lately given effect to contracts by companies having a royal charter only; but the difference between a corporation at common law and one created by Parliament where it has not all the powers expressly or impliedly given by the Act, does not appear to have been presented to the consideration of the Court.—p. 418.

CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—The case chiefly relied upon by the defendants' counsel was Ernest v. Nicholls. We are, of course, bound by the judgment of the H. L. in that case, and we should have all most heartily concurred in it—the question having been “as to a special contract to do the very unusual thing of purchasing by one company the trade of another.” But we are not bound by the extra-judicial observations of any noble and learned lord delivered in that assembly, although they are, no doubt, entitled to high consideration.—p. 309.

M. SMITH, J.—In Henderson v. Royal Mail, &c. Co. (supra, col. 715), all the judges adopt the rule suggested in Dunstan v. Imperial Gas Light Co., and hold it to be law; Wightman, J., who was an extremely cautious judge, saying: “The result of the cases seem to me to be, that, whenever the contract is made with relation to the purposes of the incorporation, it may, if the corporation be a trading one, be enforced though not under seal.” The rest of the Court lay down the rule in equally plain and simple terms; and I entirely agree with them. Applying the principle of that case to the present—a pumping engine was a thing proper and necessary for the purposes for which this company was incorporated, and therefore the contract for it was enforceable, though not under seal. This decision, no doubt, conflicts with East London Waterworks Co. v. Bailey (col. 714). The majority of the Court of Q. B. in effect treat that case as contrary to the current of decision. The results of these decisions and the present is that East London Waterworks Co. v. Bailey can no longer be considered to be law.—p. 475.

KELLY, C.B.—In considering this case, however, we have been obliged to direct our attention to Fishmongers' Co. v. Robertson, on account of a dictum which forms part of the elaborate judgment of the learned Tindal, C.J. He says (at p. 192): "Even if the contract put in suit by the corporation had been on their part executory only, not executed, we feel little doubt but that their suing upon the contract would amount to an admission on record by them that such contract was duly entered into on their part, so as to be obligatory on themselves, and that such admission on the record would estop them from setting up an objection in a cross action that it was not sealed with their common seal. The Mayor of Thetford's Case (supra, col. 714) is cited as an authority for this proposition, but it does not support it in any degree whatever. It was a case of mandamus, and it was held that the return did not require to be sealed. There is no authority for saying that a record binds a plaintiff in such a manner, and the doctrine has been completely overruled in Copper Miners' Co. v. Fox (supra, col. 716), although the observations of Tindal, C.J. are entitled to very great respect.—p. 162.

SMITH, L.J.—Reading the terms of the section [sect. 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893], it seems to me perfectly clear that the meaning is that the defendant shall be entitled to costs as between solicitor and client in such cases as he is entitled to costs. It does not mean that whenever the defendant obtains a judgment he shall, no matter how unreasonable, vexatious, or oppressive his conduct may have been, be entitled to costs as between solicitor and client. I do not think that that is a reasonable reading of the section. I think the meaning is that where the defendant is entitled to costs, he shall be entitled to have them taxed on the scale of costs as between solicitor and client. The only divergent opinion on the point is that of Mr. Justice Bruce, for whose opinion I have the greatest respect, in Cree v. St. Pancras Vestry. I cannot, however, agree with his view. On the other hand, there are the opinions of Lord Justice Romer in North Metropolitan Tramways Co. v. L.C.C., of Mr. Justice Bigham in Westminster (Duke) v. Bedford (Duke), and of the Lord Chief Justice in the present case, after further consideration and full argument. As to Hasker v. Wood, I only wish to say that as soon as one has arrived at the true construction of the section that case has no application.—p. 949.

LINDLEY, L.J. . . . At the time of the Judicature Act, 1873, it had long been the settled practice of the Court not to award such costs. That state of things was very unjust, and in Mercers' Co., Ex parte, the late M.R. thought that the difficulty was got over by the rules framed under the Judicature Act, 1873. However in Mills' Estate, In re, that case was not followed, and the reason why it was not followed was that the rules made in pursuance of the Judicature Act could not confer upon the Court any greater jurisdiction than the Act itself. That difficulty was felt, and it was felt as one that ought to be got rid of: and sect. 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, was passed for the purpose, amongst other things, of removing what was admitted to be an unjust anomaly; and now, when money is paid in under an Act of Parliament which contains no express provisions as to the costs of payment out, and an application is made for payment out, sect. 5 hits the blot and enables the Court to award such costs.—p. 236.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The costs are in the discretion of the judge, and there is no appeal from a mere matter of discretion. But it is said that that is contrary to the construction which was put upon the law as to costs by Jessel, M.R. in Cooper v. Whittingham. All that I can say is that, if the Court intended in that case to lay down what is contended on behalf of the appellant here, the judgment is to that extent erroneous. I do not, however, understand Sir Geo. Jessel to say anything of the kind.—p. 358.

STIRLING, J.—I cannot think that in every case in which a small retail dealer has innocently (and I think that the defendants in this case have innocently) happened to purchase a small quantity of the spurious goods, he ought to be fixed with the costs of the motion to restrain the infringement. There is no authority to that effect. There is authority to the contrary in the judgment, with which I entirely agree, in Upmann v. Forester, where Chitty, J. expressly says: "The result of my decision will not be, as the defendant has suggested, that every purchaser of a small parcel of spurious goods incurs a liability to pay the costs of an action in the Chancery Division for infringing a patent or trade mark. I cannot pass over the fact that there is in the present case a large consignment of goods."—p. 344.

NORTH, J.—The plaintiffs claim all the costs, upon the ground that a legal right has been infringed. In Cooper v. Whittingham Sir Geo. Jessel laid it down that where a plaintiff comes to enforce a legal right, and there has been no misconduct on his part (no omission or neglect which would induce the Court to deprive him of his costs), the Court has no discretion, and cannot take away the plaintiff's right to costs. Chitty, J. seems to have taken much the same view in Upmann v. Forester. I never could understand that view. It seems to me going directly in the teeth of the General Orders and Act of Parliament, which say that the judge has a discretion which he is to exercise, and is not bound by any hard and fast rule. And I am glad to see that in the recent case of The American Tobacco Co. v. Guest, Stirling, J. has taken the same view.—p. 528.

BOWEN, L.J. (for the Court).—Cooper v. Whittingham was not a decision on the meaning of the term "good cause" [in Ord. LXV r. 1]. It was an enunciation of a principle upon which, in the opinion of the M.R., judges should exercise their discretion under the earlier portion of the rule which relates to actions tried before a judge without a jury. Against any attempt on the part of any Court to impose by definition or otherwise a fetter on the discretion which the law has left to a judge in any particular case this Court has always protested. It would be far too narrow a view were we to hold that good cause only exists where there has been misconduct, oppression, or injustice on the part of the successful party.

ROMER, J.—No doubt prima facie an order to tax costs means taxation between party and party, and it would be better in cases of the kind now before me to insert expressly in the judgment that the costs are to be taxed as between solicitor and client. But the omission would not deprive the defendant entitled to the benefit of the statute [the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893] of solicitor and client costs, the Court having no discretion in the matter when once it is clear that in substance judgment has been obtained by the defendant. Nor is it necessary that the judgment itself should show on its face that the action was one falling within the Act. See Finlay v. Seaton, where a similar question arose under the Act 11 Geo. 2, c. 19; and see also Edwards v. Davies with reference to the special Act there referred to. What Wood, V.-C. said in Lister v. Leather is not inconsistent with the view I take. There the V.-C. was only deciding what form it would be right his judgment should take in a patent action, having regard to the provisions of sect. 43 of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852; and it was especially advisable, whether necessary or not, that his judgment should declare that the costs he was giving were to be taxed as between solicitor and client, seeing that he had a judicial discretion whether he should give solicitor and client costs or not.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The principle on which that case is supposed to rest seems to be, that if there are no facts before the judge which could constitute "good cause," then the judge has no jurisdiction to interfere, and his order would be erroneous. So far I can see no reason to dissent; I concur so far. But, my lords, I do not feel called on to offer any opinion as to whether there were circumstances in that case which might constitute "good cause," and which the judge determined did amount to good cause for his interference; nor am I prepared to adopt the proposition that the Lord Chief Justices in making the order which he did make in that case assumed to have a jurisdiction without there being any facts which gave him that jurisdiction.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for the Court).—Counterclaims, although cross-actions for all purposes of procedure and evidence, cost less than actions, and the party who has to pay the costs of the counterclaim gets the benefit of the cheaper procedure. To include in the costs of the counterclaim any costs not occasioned by its being a counterclaim, but saved by being what it is, appears to us wrong in principle and is opposed to Saner v. Bilton and Ward v. Morse. If Lord Esher really meant to express a contrary opinion [in Shrapnel v. Laing] we cannot agree with him. We are satisfied that there is no decision to that effect.

They (the costs of the action) cannot have been increased by the counterclaim, and no part of them can be properly regarded as costs of the counterclaim.—p. 818.

HAWKINS, J.—I am aware that the view I have expressed may be thought not to accord with that taken in Potter v. Chambers. I cannot, however, help thinking that that case, which was very little argued, was decided upon the assumption that the plaintiff's claim was reduced below 20l. by counterclaim as distinguished from set-off. Nevertheless, as reported, that case certainly does appear to support the view taken by the plaintiffs, and I feel myself therefore bound by it. The question, however, is of such practical importance that I have thought it right to express my own view upon the subject, though, of course, with great diffidence, seeing that my lord (Kelly, C.B.) entertains an opposite opinion.—p. 300.

POLLOCK, B.—The decisions which have gone before, namely, those in Staples v. Young, Blake v. Appleyard and Potter v. Chambers are decisions in cases in which the Court had to consider partly the question which we are considering, but partly also the question of the County Court statutes : and the question then arose as to the distinction between the County Court Acts, which say, when they deprive a plaintiff of costs when he brings his action in a superior Court when he could have brought it in an inferior Court, that the test is to be derived at by the amount recovered. Those are the words used, and upon those words there can be little doubt whatever. On the other hand, when those sections come to be applied to the superior Courts, the Judicature Act of 1873, by sect. 67, expressly provides that those sections shall apply only to those actions pending in the High Court of Justice, in which the relief sought can be given in the County Court. That cannot apply to the present case. In all those cases a real desire has been shown by the judges so to mete out the law as to effect what they believe to be an equitable adjustment of costs. The case of Davidson v. Gray, in the Queen's Bench Division, is in substance very like the present one.—p. 858.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It was, however, pressed upon us on the discussion of the rule with reference to the question of costs, that the claim of the plaintiff having been reduced by the counterclaim to 15*l.*, and a counterclaim being, as was contended, equivalent to, and standing on the same footing as, a plea of set-off, the plaintiff could not, according to the statutes of set-off, be said to have recovered more than 15*l.*, and therefore was not entitled to costs—a contention upheld by the decision of the Exchequer Division to that effect in Staples v. Young, an authority which, if it is to be followed, is decisive of the question before us. But I cannot acquiesce in the view taken in Staples v. Young, or abide by and follow the decision in that case. In my opinion, it is altogether a mistake to treat a counterclaim and set-off as standing on the same footing, or a counterclaim as equivalent only to a set-off. Set-off and counterclaim may be, and commonly are, essentially different, and it becomes necessary, therefore, to see in each case whether a counterclaim amounts in effect to no more than a set-off, or whether it is in effect a cross-action (p. 574). It appears to me, therefore, that the contention of the defendant founded on the authority of Staples v. Young and the reasoning in that case, that a plaintiff does not recover the amount which he establishes on his own claim, when the amount for which he can have judgment is reduced by the counterclaim, is unsound and ought not to prevail (p. 578). I am of opinion that the 67th section of the Act of 1873 has not the effect of raising the amount necessary to entitle the plaintiff to costs beyond the amount fixed by the 5th section of the Act of 1867. But it is said that although the view which I have thus expressed would have been the right one had the case been tried out, and the verdict of the jury taken, and judgment given thereupon in the ordinary course, yet that as here the cause was referred to arbitration, and by the terms of the order of reference the costs of the action were to abide the event, the arbitrator having made his award in favour of the plaintiff for 15*l.*, as the balance of the two claims as established, this was the event on which the costs of the action were to depend. This contention is directly at variance with the decision of the Exchequer Division in Cole v. Firth (L. R. 4 Ex. D. 301), but it is said to be upheld by that of the Court of Appeal in Chatfield v. Sedgwick. But, in my opinion, the judgment in the last-mentioned case, giving the costs to the defendant, is not, when rightly considered, in conflict with my view of the law. The plaintiff in that case sued the defendant for 37*l.* 10*s.*, but, on a reference to a master, established his claim to the extent only of 16*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* The defendant on his counterclaim established a claim against the plaintiff to the amount of 23*l.*, thus making a balance in his favour of 6*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* It was held by the Common Pleas Division, that while the plaintiff, having recovered less than 20*l.*, was disentitled to costs by sect. 5 of the County Courts Act of 1867, the defendant not coming under the operation of the County Courts Acts, was, though he recovered only 6*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*, entitled to the costs of his counterclaim. This decision was in my opinion perfectly correct. Claim and counterclaim being for liquidated damages, to the extent to which the amount established by the defendant was co-extensive with, and so operated to extinguish, the plaintiff's claim, the counterclaim operated as a set-off : in reference to the amount by which it exceeded the plaintiff's claim it operated as a cross-action, recovering in which the defendant would be entitled to his costs. A fortiori would this be the case if the counterclaim is to be treated as a cross-action to the full extent of the defendant's demand. It is true that the Court of Appeal, while upholding the judgment of the Common Pleas Division, appear to have done so on a different ground, namely, that by the terms of the order of reference the costs were to abide the event, and that the decision of the master, that on the balance of account the plaintiff owed the defendant 6*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* was the event. I am not at all sure that I rightly appreciate the meaning or effect of this decision. In one sense, indeed, but in one sense only, the decision of the master that the plaintiff owed the defendant 6*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* may be said to have been the event on which the costs would depend. The counterclaim being, so far as it was co-extensive with the plaintiff's demand, a plea of set-off would, on being established, defeat the plaintiff's right of action, and so entitle the defendant to costs. A fortiori was this the case when, after thus extinguishing the plaintiff's claim, the counterclaim, operating, as it did, as a cross-action, established a cause of action against the plaintiff. If, however, the ratio decidendi in Chatfield v. Sedgwick is to be taken to be, as from the language of the judgment would seem to be the case, that the provision in the order of reference makes the right to costs depend absolutely on whether the balance is on the side of plaintiff or defendant, I must respectfully dissent from such a position, and can only hold myself bound by the decision, where the facts with which I have to deal are precisely the same as those in Chaffield v. Sedgwick, which certainly is not the case here.—p. 579. MANISTY, J. concurred.

FIELD, J. dissented.

COTTON, L.J.—The judges of the Divisional Court seem to have thought that this case was the same in principle as that of Knight v. Pussell, but that assumes that the order in this case is the same as was the order there, which it is not. It differs entirely from it.

Knight v. Pussell, form of order held applicable.

Jenkins v. Jackson (1890) 60 L. J. Ch. 206; [1891] 1 Ch. 89; 63 L. T. 688; 39 W. R. 242.—C.A. LINDLEY, BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.
—BOWEN, L.J.—I think . . . that here the wrong form of order has been adopted. It seems to me that the judge really intended to give the plaintiff the general costs of the action. That is the form to which on my side we are most accustomed. Of course the Chancery Division has its own forms, which are more appropriate to the business prevailing in Chancery. Again, I also think on the common law side of the Court we should probably have construed this order as giving the plaintiff the general costs of the action; but it seems to me that in Chancery it has been construed in a different way, and that Knight v. Pussell really cannot be overruled or set aside and treated as of no effect. That case really settles the practice.—p. 208.

Baines v. Bromley (1881) 50 L. J. Q. B. 465; 6 Q. B. D. 691; 44 L. T. 915; 29 W. R. 706.—C.A. BRAMWELL, BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ.: reversing 50 L. J. Q. B. 129; 6 Q. B. D. 197; 43 L. T. 785; 29 W. R. 245.—POLLOCK, B., explained.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—It was contended that in Baines v. Bromley, decided in this Court, it had been held that where a plaintiff brings an action in contract, and the defendant, instead of contesting himself with pleading a set-off and succeeding upon it, goes on to counterclaim in contract to a greater extent than would be necessary to sustain the set-off, and succeeds upon the counterclaim, although in the first case he would have been entitled to the costs of the cause, in the second he would be disentitled to them, and the plaintiff would get them all. Of course, if that had been decided in this Court, we should have been bound to submit to the decision, but the law would certainly have been in a singular state. And it appears, upon closely looking into Baines v. Bromley, that nothing of the sort has been decided. It is true that the judgment in that case is, mutatis mutandis, in the same words and form as this, but the Court in Baines v. Bromley pointed out that they were not asked to set aside or re-form the judgment, but to say whether a taxation had under the words of the judgment was proper. . . . Here the form of the judgment is challenged, and we are asked to re-form the judgment.—p. 825.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question is, whether in this case the provisions of the County Courts Act, 1867, applies, and takes the case out of that decision, and whether an amount, not exceeding 20*l.*, having been recovered by the plaintiff upon his claim he is not entitled to the costs of the issues with regard to such amount. It does not seem to me that Lund v. Campbell in any way interferes with the pre-existing authorities on that point. This point did not arise and was not considered in that case. Apart from the authorities, if this case had to be considered now for the first time, I should say that the rational conclusion would be that a plaintiff, who would not be entitled to the costs of the action if the claim had stood alone and there had been no counterclaim, and he had succeeded to the extent of 18*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* only, cannot be entitled to costs merely because the defendant having counterclaimed against him and succeeded in recovering a larger sum, he has failed so far as the general result of the action is concerned. DENMAN, J. concurred.

The next step was taken in Prudhomme v. Fraser, where, upon one count for libel, the defendant was held entitled to the costs incurred by disproving the innuendoes negatived by the jury. I am not prepared to say that decision was wrong, though I entertain some little doubt about it.—p. 490

COCKBURN, C. J.—It is true that in *Anderson v. BUTT, P.—Although I have very considerable difficulty in agreeing with the reasons given by the learned judges of the Q. B. D. in Walker v. Crystal Palace Gas Co., I certainly should have felt bound to differ, and should have deferred, to that authority had there been no cases conflicting with it. But there is manifestly a conflict of authority upon the point. Besides the equity cases cited, a case said to conflict, and which I think does conflict, with that authority, was decided in chambers by Grantham, J. after consulting, I am told, some other judge; but that is disposed of by the learned judges of the Q. B. D. who decided Walker v. Crystal Palace Gas Co. They say that the decision of Grantham, J. was a decision in chambers, and no doubt decisions in chambers are apt to be given in a greater hurry than in matters which are fully discussed in Court. But I cannot also fail to observe that it would appear from the report of Walker v. Crystal Palace Gas Co., that the attention of the learned judges was not directed to a most important part of the rule under consideration [Ord. LXV. r. 27, sub-r. 48]. I mean the second paragraph, which runs: "The like allowances . . . have been used."

COLLINS, J.—Although the decision of the Court in this case does not follow Walker v. The Crystal Palace Gas Co., it is supported by the judgment of Sir Charles Butt in The Courier, and the decision of Mr. Justice Grantham, after consultation with another judge, in Gibbs v. Barrow (30 Sol. J. 538), and another decision by Mr. Justice Chitty (Collins v. Worley). The weight of authority, therefore, and of common sense are in favour of allowing the appeal.—pp. 318, 319.

COTTON, C.J.—That really is the decision in Svensden v. Wallace. The Court there did not decide that daily refreshers are to be allowed, but only that the master has a discretion as to allowing what they do call refreshers, which perhaps is an unfortunate term. They had better have said if one may entice in any way the language used by one's brethren in the common law division, an addressee to the fees marked originally on the brief of counsel. They made that order having regard to the amount allowed for refreshers under the ordinary rule, but it is not allowing refreshers in the sense in which refreshers are dealt with in the rules as to taxation. That case was decided having regard to [Ord. LXV. r. 27], sub-division 30. . . . That decision only amounted to this, "We think the master is not bound to disregard any suggested addition to the fees of counsel. He must take into consideration the matter, and as in the Exchequer Chamber and, as we now know in the C. A. in Chancery, the master has a discretion to consider whether the original fee marked was from an accidental circumstance or otherwise insufficient, he may allow an addition to be made to that." That was called a refresher, but really it was not a refresher in the sense in which that word is used when we consider the sum fixed as the proper amount to be allowed for a daily refresher in witness cases. In my opinion here, all that North, J. intended to decide was this: that the master not allowing, as a fixed and definite sum, having regard to the time occupied, daily refreshers, is at liberty to consider whether in his discretion it would be right to make any addition to the fees marked on the brief of counsel.—pp. 331, 332.

FRY, J.—Then it is said that in Chapman v. Midland Railway Co. the Queen's Bench Division seem to have taken a somewhat different view, and to have thought that the assertion of a title by the defendant would make some difference. But that case was afterwards taken to the Court of Appeal, and I do not find that any of the judges of that Court adopted the view of the Divisional Court. This being so, I suggest to the judges of the Divisional Court that the present case is not within the rule, and consequently that the higher scale of costs does not apply, and with that expression of my opinion I leave the matter to them.—p. 74.

FRY, L.J. (for the Court).—The general jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in this respect is stated with great clearness by the lords justices in Mordue v. Palmer. In the course of a Chancery suit a reference was made to arbitration, which ordered that the costs should be in the determination of the arbitrator. He awarded them as between solicitor and client, and the C.A. held that as the reference was in Chancery the arbitrator had power so to do. "The common law Courts," said Mellish, L.J., "have no power to give costs as between solicitor and client, and therefore when there is a reference, the arbitrator cannot give any other than costs between party and party. But it is otherwise with Courts of equity; and I therefore think that when a reference as to costs is made by a Court of equity, the Court gives the arbitrator jurisdiction to award costs as between solicitor and client if he shall think fit." It was argued that in Cockburn v. Edwards a different view was taken by the C.A., but the question then only arose indirectly, and the point does not appear to have been argued. If therefore there is any discrepancy between this case and Mordue v. Palmer, we think that the decision in the latter case must prevail, not only as more express, but as being in accordance with the earlier authorities.—p. 697.

6. EFFECT OF COUNTY COURTS ACT.

BRAXWELL, B.—The case of Gray v. West appears at first sight to lay down that in all cases which must be brought in a superior Court, an order or rule for costs ought to be granted. I do not, however, desire—and I do not think my brother Hayes, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench desired—to lay down so wide a rule. For the action might be vexatious, and I should be very sorry to be obliged to regard the verdict of a jury as absolutely conclusive.—p. 151.

BLACKBURN, J.—Gray v. West and Craven v. Smith decide that, in exercising their discretion, the Court may take as one element for consideration the fact that an action of slander cannot be brought in the County Court.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court).—This appeal raises the point left undetermined by Harris v. Judge. But that case turned on the same sections of the County Courts Act, 1888, as have to be considered on the present occasion, and throws considerable light on their true construction. The sections are 65 and 116 of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43. Section 65 applies in terms to actions commenced in the High Court and sent for trial in the County Court. Section 116 applies in terms to all actions brought in the High Court which might have been brought in the County Court. The two sections, therefore, are not mutually exclusive; they may both stand together so far as their subject-matter is concerned; and so far as they are not inconsistent they ought to be read together. This was the view taken in Harris v. Judge. Upon the particular point which had then to be decided, the two sections could not be construed together, and sect. 65 was held to prevail over sect. 116; but it does not follow that the result ought to be the same in the present case. The last part of sect. 65 says in terms what scale of costs is to be allowed in the cases to which it relates. It applies as well to plaintiffs as to defendants; but it does not say or mean that the costs which, if allowed, are to be taxed according to the scale mentioned, are in all cases to be allowed either to the plaintiff or to the defendant. Whether they are to be allowed or not, and to whom, depends on other sections. The section which enables the County Court judge to give costs is sect. 118; but as regards actions brought in the High Court, but which might have been brought in the County Court, there are specific directions or rules contained in sect. 116, and these specific directions or rules must be applied by the judge of the County Court to whom an action brought in the High Court, but which might have been brought in the County Court, is sent for trial. This is what I said in Harris v. Judge, and which on consideration we are still of opinion is correct. The language, however, which I used in Harris v. Judge, was too wide, and was understood by Cave, J. to mean that the County Court judge could give the certificate referred to in sect. 116. We agree with him that the County Court judge cannot do that, and my language to that extent ought to be corrected. The clause in sect. 116 relating to the certificate or order allowing costs can only come into operation where the action is tried in the High Court. . . . We are of opinion (1) that the rules laid down in clauses 1 and 2 of sect. 116, depriving a plaintiff of costs wholly or partially, are applicable to all actions brought in the High Court which might have been brought in the County Court, whether tried in the High Court or ordered to be tried in the County Court under sect. 65; and (2) that those rules apply to all the costs of such actions, and not only to so much of them as, in a case ordered to be tried in the County Court, have been incurred antecedently to such order.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—“The words used in sect. 116 [of the County Courts Act, 1888] are, ‘which could have been commenced in a County Court,’ instead of ‘in which any relief is sought which can be given in a County Court.’ The question is whether the words used in sect. 116 do not really mean the same thing as those used in the former enactment. I read them as meaning ‘which could ‘properly’ have been commenced in the County Court,” both as regards the character of the action and the amount really involved. At what time it is to be ascertained whether the action is, as regards amount, properly within the jurisdiction of the County Court? Not, in my opinion, at the time when the plaintiff is stating what amount he thinks fit to claim on the writ or statement of claim, but at the time when the amount recoverable is adjudicated on by the proper tribunal or otherwise ascertained by the result. It cannot depend on the amount which the plaintiff chooses to claim. . . . With regard to the cases cited, there has been some confusion on the subject, and I do not think the decisions can all of them be reconciled with one another. If it be necessary to decide between them, I prefer the decision of Hawkins and Lawrence, JJ. in Lovejoy v. Cole, to that of Charles, J. in Goldhill v. Clarke, which I have great difficulty in following. I think that—as Brett, L.J. said in Chatfield v. Sedgwick, which was an express decision of the C. A. with regard to words which, though not identical with those we have to construe, are in my opinion to the same effect—the amount the plaintiff claims has nothing to do with the matter. It is the amount which is in the result recovered that is material.—pp. 82, 83.

BOVILL, C.J.—In the case of Tatton v. G. W. Ry. which was cited, the Q. B. treated the cause of action as one founded on tort; but the L.C.J. expressed his regret at the anomalous state of the law, by which an option being given to the plaintiff to sue in either form, the right of costs depended merely upon the form of the declaration. It is sufficient to say with regard to that case, that the Court considered the form of declaration to amount to case and not contract. There was no statement there of any promise or consideration as in this case; but the cause of action was founded wholly on the breach of duty. The case is, therefore, clearly distinguishable from the present, inasmuch as it proceeds on the precise character of the cause of action as alleged in the declaration, which was wholly different from that in the present case (p. 847). Looking at those authorities, Legge v. Tucker (1 H. & N. 500; 26 L. J. Ex. 71) and Morgan v. Ravey (6 H. & N. 265; 30 L. J. Ex. 131), if it were now necessary to consider the case of Tatton v. G. W. Ry., and to decide upon what seems to amount to a conflict of authority, I should be disposed to adopt the decisions of the Court of Exchequer and the principles on which they are based; but it is not necessary to do so in this case, inasmuch as it is distinguishable from Tutton v. G. W. Ry. in the form of the declaration.—p. 348.

BRAMWELL, L.J. (for himself, BAGGALLAY and TRESIGER, L.J.J.)—It is unnecessary for us to determine whether Tutton v. G. W. Ry. was rightly decided; for it came before the Court of Q. B. before the passing of the County Courts Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 5; but we may say that we are not satisfied with the decision in that case. . . . It is manifest that Pontifex v. Midland Ry. is very distinguishable from the present case. Hence the real ground of complaint was the breach of the contract to deliver.

COLLINS, M.R.—There is the case of St. John's College, Cambridge v. Pierrepont, to which I have already referred, in which the opposite view has been taken; but it is remarkable that the earlier case of Danby v. Lamb does not appear to have been cited, and I cannot say what the opinion of the Court would have been had that case been brought to their attention. It seems to me that there is a preponderating authority for the view that I have indicated—that the fair meaning of the words "action founded on tort" in sect. 116, sub-sect. 2, is that a tort should be the gist of the action, and that the section is not applicable to an action which, though nominally to recover damages for a tort, includes, as the main relief sought, a claim for an injunction.

ROMER, L.J.—It seems to me that the view taken of this matter by the C. A. in Ireland, and by the Q. B. D. in Bradley v. Archibald (1894) 2 L. R. 108, is a sound view, and that St. John's College, Cambridge v. Pierrepont was wrongly decided.

KELLY, C.B.—It was contended that the case of Hatch v. Lewis was an authority that the Court would not interfere with the discretion of the judge at Nisi Prius (as to costs); but that case was wholly different. It was an action brought for the recovery of damages merely, but the present action is brought to try a right which, if it existed, would materially affect the value of the plaintiff's land.—p. 23. BRAMWELL and CHANNELL, B.B. concurred; CLEASBY, B. doubting.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—Hinde v. Sheppard is an authority for saying not only that the Court may, but that they ought to, review the discretion of the judge if satisfied that he has exercised it erroneously. There a right to land was in issue. Willes, J. refused to certify at the trial; and a judge at chambers also refused, under the latter part of this section (sect. 5 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), to make an order for costs. The Court of Ex. were divided on this question. The L.C.B. and Bramwell and Channell, B.B., were in favour of a review of the judge's discretion. Cleasby, B. not differing from the rest of the Court, thought the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to question the jurisdiction of the judge, save under very exceptional circumstances. If that case be taken as deciding that, where a title or right comes in issue, the presiding judge is bound to certify, as the language of Bramwell, B. might seem to import, it is a pity that the legislature should have passed two or three Acts to so little purpose, seeing that some right is nearly always in issue. The section in question, as it seems to me, implies a discretion in the judge to grant or withhold his certificate, according to the impression made upon his mind by the facts appearing before him. The L.C.B., in Hinde v. Sheppard, though he differed from the exercise of discretion by Willes, J., and overruled it, does not in his judgment in reality go further than the Courts had gone before; and it is clearly too late now to dispute their right to do so. All that that case must be taken to decide is that, in certain cases, the Court will overrule the discretion of the judge. It decides no principle, but merely that the judge was wrong in that case, which in this case I do not think he was.—p. 95.

WILLES, J.—It appears to me that the costs under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 34, are the same as those under the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, s. 3; and not, as has been contended on the part of the plaintiff, interlocutory costs, but costs which are to be taxed on the final results of the cause. If so, the decision of the Court in Burdon v. Flower was right, and that of the Court of Ex. in Bentley v. Dawes is not to be sustained.—p. 285.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is clear, in my opinion, that this is a case in which an appeal as to costs is allowable. The only excuse for the objection to the appeal is the recent case of In re Hoskins. In Cutler v. Stratton [42 L. J. Ch. 417; L. R. 8 Ch. 295. See "MORTGAGE"], the claim of trustees for costs is rightly put on the same footing as that of mortgagees (p. 304). . . . But it is said that In re Hoskins is to a different effect. In that case Lord Justice James is reported to have said, "The present case is not a case where the appellant is ex debito iustitie entitled to costs; the costs of a trustee being subject to the discretion of the Court." If I have to choose between the authority of Lord Selborne in Cutler v. Stratton and Lord Justice James, I should be inclined to follow Lord Selborne's decision. But I go farther. I think it was not in the power of the Court, in In re Hoskins, to overrule the previous authorities; therefore I must take the decision in that case to have been founded on a mistaken view of the law, and to be subject to review.—p. 305.

Farrow v. Austin is directly in point.—p. 306.

COTTON, L.J.—I should myself have had some doubt whether a residuary legatee, either absolutely or for life in the whole residue, is in the position of a person who has a right to the costs of an administration action out of the estate, unless he has been guilty of some misconduct. But the decision of the Court of Appeal in Farrow v. Austin is, that a residuary legatee or executor filing a bill for administration has a right to have his costs out of the estate unless that right is displaced by showing some special grounds for depriving him of them.—p. 498.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The rule (Ord. LXV. r. 1) provides that the costs of all proceedings in the S. C. are to be in the discretion of the Court or judge. . . . It does not mean in a case where an estate is being administered by the Court, that the costs of an independent proceeding which is only incidentally connected with the administration are to be in the discretion of the judge who is administering the estate. Although such costs are costs in relation to the action in which they are incurred, the moment a trustee comes to the Court of administration, and asks that such costs shall be allowed out of the trust estate, they cease to be costs, and become charges and expenses. . . . They are no longer costs in the discretion of the Court. I should have thought on principle that this was plain, had it not been for the case of Charles v. Jones. The distinction I have taken between costs in the discretion of the Court under sect. 49 [of the Judicature Act, 1873], and charges and expenses was pointed out in In re Chennell, where it was held that an appeal lay from an order allowing a trustee certain charges and expenses. . . . Charles v. Jones looked at first as though it were a decision the other way; but a closer examination of that case shows that it is not so. . . . It is true that there is a passage in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., which looks as if some question had been raised as to charges and expenses as distinguished from costs; but I think the point before us was not really before the C. A. in that case, and was not involved in the decision of the Court. . . . The ambiguity which that case presented when first looked at has been removed by examining the entry in the registrar's books of the actual orders made by Bacon, V.-C., and the C. A. from which it appears that the orders contain no mention of charges and expenses. . . .—pp. 235, 236.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for the Court).—The City of Manchester was not cited in Charles v. Jones, and the view expressed by Cotton, L.J. [in the latter case] is this: "Even if the judge did not 'exercise his discretion,' if it is a case in which the Act leaves the costs to the discretion of the judge, it takes away the power of this Court to entertain an appeal from his decision." If The City of Manchester had been before the Court he would probably not have expressed himself in quite those terms; but it is obvious that the two views cannot stand together, and the conclusion which we have arrived at is that the interpretation put upon the section in The City of Manchester is the right one—that is, if the costs are in the discretion of the judge, the Court of Appeal will assume that the judge has exercised his discretion, unless it is satisfied that he has not done so, but has applied some rule which in fact excluded his discretion.—p. 659.

Bew v. Bew (1899).—C.A. LINDLEY, M.R., SIR F. H. JEUNE and ROMER, L.J.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for the Court).—There is a discrepancy between Charles v. Jones and Chennell, In re. . . . In Chennell, In re, the Court, in the language of Sir George Jessel, M.R., laid down that an appeal without leave would lie where the order included trustees' charges and expenses in the costs of the action—that is, if the three things were included in the order together, an appeal would lie as to the costs of the action only, without reference to the question whether there was anything else in the order which was open to objection. That is inconsistent with Charles v. Jones, and on that point we think that Charles v. Jones ought to be followed. You cannot have an appeal as to costs by invoking in and another part of the order as to which there is no complaint. On that we adopt the view of Cotton, L.J., in Charles v. Jones—that is, you cannot appeal as to costs only if there is nothing wrong with the order as to charges and expenses.—p. 659.

CAVE, J.—It was never intended in Chennell, In re, Jones v. Chennell, to lay down that, because certain costs [namely, the costs of a trustee] were not in the discretion of the judge, therefore they should not be taxed at all.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—In Crowley v. Vitty, Parke, B. is reported to have said (21 L. J. Ex. 136): "The County Court has no jurisdiction if the rent is above 50L." But the question we have to consider was not much discussed there, and the distinction between rent and value was taken. In Featon v. Norrell (an earlier case) (5 D. & L. 445; 13 Jur. 325) Patteson, J. declared himself to be of the contrary opinion; and to this opinion, upon a motion for a prohibition in this very case, the judges of the Court of Exchequer unanimously adhered, after time taken to consider. I therefore come to the conclusion that the County Court has jurisdiction, and that this rule for a prohibition ought to be discharged. My brother Erle has seen this judgment, and entirely agrees with it.

Mouliet v. Washburn (1886) 54 L. T. 16.
HANNEN, P.—The case was remitted, upon the order of a master, to the County Court for trial, and to this course it is sworn that the defendant consented. When the case came on for hearing the defendant took a preliminary objection, on which he failed, and the case was adjourned for hearing on the award. The defendant, some time after, moved for a prohibition forbidding the case to be heard in the County Court, on the ground that some of the items in the counter-claim were of an unliquidated character: and he relied upon the recent case of Mackay v. Bannister, in which it was held, that an action, although for a sum not exceeding 50*l.*, cannot be remitted, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26, to the County Court for trial if there be a counter-claim for unliquidated damages. We are bound by that decision, but in my opinion there are facts in this case which did not exist in that, and which clearly distinguish the two. In this case the order remitting the case for trial to the County Court was made by consent, and the defendant appeared in the County Court, and apparently then took objections other than those now relied upon on his behalf. The case of Jones v. James seems to me to be directly in point.

ESHER, M.R.—If that decision had been applicable to the section now before us [sect. 65 of the County Courts Act, 1885] we should have had to consider whether we agreed with it. Even if it had been applicable to this section, it would not have been binding on us, and I am disposed to think I should not have agreed with it. But there is no occasion for us to overrule it. It was a decision on another Act of Parliament, which has been repealed, and it is no authority with regard to the construction of the Act now in question.

SMITH, L.J.—As to the cases which have been cited to us in my opinion, the decision in Keeble v. Bennett was right. In Bailey v. Watson the previous case of Keeble v. Bennett was distinguished on the ground that in the first-mentioned case there was a judgment in the High Court for a certain amount and also for costs. LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court).—Again it was urged that the costs referred to in sect. 116 were not all the costs of the action, but only those incurred in the High Court, and that in a case brought in the High Court and ordered to be tried in the County Court, under sect. 65, the plaintiff might lose the costs incurred by him in the High Court, and yet recover the costs incurred by him in the County Court. For this construction reliance was placed on Armitage v. Fison & Co. With deference to the learned judges who decided that case, we think the language of sect. 116, if it applies at all, is too clear and unambiguous to be confined to part only of the plaintiff's costs. In the cases to which the section applies, if the plaintiff recovers less than 20*l.* in an action founded on contract, the section says "he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action," unless he gets such a certificate as is afterwards mentioned, and which in an action ordered to be tried in a County Court, under sect. 65, the plaintiff cannot get. For these reasons, we are of opinion: first, that the rules laid down in clauses 1 and 2 of sect. 116, depriving a plaintiff of costs, wholly or partially, are applicable to all actions brought in the High Court which might have been brought in the County Court, whether tried in the High Court, or ordered to be tried in the County Court under sect. 65; and secondly, that those rules apply to all the costs of such action, and not only to so much of them as in a case, ordered to be tried in the County Court have been incurred antecedently to such order.—p. 277.

BRETT, M.R.—I cannot agree with the test suggested by Whiteside, C.J., in Counsel v. Garvie, that the term "viable means" means "tangible means," or with the argument that it means "means which can be made available to execution or attachment." That meaning is, in my opinion, too narrow.—p. 840.

WRIGHT, J.—As to the case of *Pitcher v. COCKBURN, C.J.—The case of Whitehead v. Procter is, no doubt, in point, but the matter was not much considered, no cause having been shown against the rule. I think the Court of Exchequer did not give sufficient weight to the words of the section (sect. 43 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108). We have jurisdiction to order the County Court judge to proceed with the hearing, and we have power over the costs of the present application; but we have no jurisdiction to deal with the judge's order relating to the costs in the County Court.—p. 20.

LOPES, L.J.—Mossop v. G. N. Ry. decided that if a County Court judge has once refused a new trial, he has no power to review his decision. But, in the present case, before the judgment refusing a new trial was drawn up, the application was renewed upon another ground, and the judge then directed that the application should stand over, except as to the grounds upon which he had already decided. There was, therefore, no final determination of the matter upon that occasion. I think that the application upon that ground for a prohibition fails.—p. 250.

WILLS, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the County Court Rules, 1886, were intended to meet the difficulty raised by *Druiff & Co. v. WILLS, J.—I have ascertained, after consulting a high authority, that it is now the practice under Ord. LXV. to exercise an unqualified discretion over costs in administration suits. . . . The case of Cooper v. Bushbridge was cited as an authority for the proposition that the old rule in equity must be applied in County Courts. But the attention of Stuart, V.-C. was not called to sect. 88 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. I therefore think that case is not an authority binding upon us.—p. 43.

SMITH, J.—It cannot be doubted that in Dingor v. Mathews (88 L. T. Jo. 139) a Divisional Court held that an appeal lay from the refusal of a County Court judge to grant a new trial . . . but it was said that Cave, J. and Charles, J., had given a contrary opinion in How v. L. & N. W. Ry. But it was not competent to those learned judges to give a decision contrary to the case I have mentioned which was cited to them; and though it appears that they expressed a doubt whether an appeal lies from the refusal to grant a new trial, that expression was only an obiter dictum, which seems to me to have been founded on a misapprehension of what the decision in Dingor v. Mathews actually was.—p. 141.

BRETT, M.R.—In Shapcott v. Chappell it was held that rule 6 of that Ord. XXXIX. applied to appeals from County Courts, and it seems to me that if rule 3 is not applicable it follows that rule 6 does not apply, and the decision in that case was wrong—p. 405. [He then proceeds carefully to analyse the various rules and orders.] . . . It follows that we cannot agree with the decision of the Divisional Court in the present case, nor with the judgment in Shapcott v. Chappell. . . . As to Shapcott v. Chappell, I will not bind myself to say that in some way or other the principle applied there might not properly be applied, but I am clearly of opinion that the Court could not properly apply Ord. XXXIX. r. 6.—p. 407.

WILLES, J. (for ERLE, C.J., WILLIAMS, J., KEATING, J. and himself).—There is a decision in the Court of Ex. Gee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry., in which the Court of Ex. held, in a similar case, that on an appeal from the decision of a County Court judge, on the ground of misdirection, the appellant, if successful, was not entitled to costs. It is in consequence of this decision that we have taken time to consider this question, but we think that the appellant is entitled to his costs. We do not think that there is, for this purpose, any analogy between the case of a new trial obtained by reason of the misdirection of a judge in an action brought in one of the superior Courts, and an appeal from a County Court on the ground of misdirection. In the former case, no doubt, the party who succeeds in obtaining the rule absolute gets no costs; but that depends entirely on the practice founded on the statutes which give costs to the successful party in actions brought in the superior Courts. It has been held that, where the judgment below is reversed in a Court of error, inasmuch as the judgment is not given for the defendant, but merely that the plaintiff, nil capiat per breve, these statutes are not applicable. And when the practice of moving for a new trial on the ground of misdirection was substituted for that of tendering a bill of exceptions, the Courts of Westminster Hall felt bound by analogy to this course of practice not to allow costs to the party who succeeded in obtaining a rule absolute for a new trial. But this in no way applies to appeals from the decision of a County Court judge on the ground of misdirection in which it is entirely in our discretion to make such order with respect to costs as we think proper. Already, in this Court, it has been held that the successful party is entitled to the costs of the appeal. . . . The only exception that appears is L. & N. W. Ry. v. Grace (2 C. B. (N.S.) 555), in which there were special circumstances which induced the Court not to grant costs to the successful party. The case as originally sent up was unsatisfactory, and was sent back for amendment. When it came back, it was found that there was no question of law for the opinion of the Court, and therefore it was considered that, though the appeal was dismissed, the respondent was not entitled to costs, the fault being in the judge for so inartificially stating the case in the first instance. This case, therefore, forms no real exception to the general rule.—p. 151.

Goodison v. Nunn (1792) 4 Term Rep. 761.

KENYON, C.J.—It seems from the case in Strange that the judges were surprised at the old decisions, and, in order to get rid of the difficulty, they said that a tender and refusal would amount to a performance; it is true that they went farther, and said that "in consideration of the premises" meant only of the covenant to transfer, and not in consideration of the actual transferring of the stock, but to the latter part of that judgment I cannot accede. It is our duty, when we see that principles of law have been misapplied in any case, to overrule it. The principle is admitted in all the cases alluded to, that, if they be dependent covenants, performance, or the offer to perform, must be pleaded on the one part, in order to found the action against the other. The mistake has been in the misapplication of that principle in the cases cited. And I am glad to find that the old cases have been overruled, and that we are now warranted by precedent as well as by principle to say that this action cannot be maintained.

Williams v. Hathaway (1877) 6 Ch. D. 544.

JESSEL, M.R.—The leading case on the subject is Furnivall v. Coombes. There the churchwardens and overseers of a parish covenanted by deed "for themselves and for their successors," with a builder to pay for the repairs of the parish church. Then there was a proviso that nothing in the deed should be taken to extend to any "personal covenant" on the part of several covenantors or their estates in their private capacity, but only on the part of the churchwardens and overseers for the time being. The covenant being a personal covenant, it was held that the effect of the proviso that the covenant should not be a personal covenant was simply to destroy it; the proviso was repugnant to the covenant, and there was no way of reconciling the two things. TINDAL, C.J., in giving judgment, says (at p. 751), "Churchwardens and overseers, though they are by statute a corporate body for some purposes, cannot enter into such a covenant as this in a corporate character; and if not, then the contract must be a personal covenant. If it be, the next question is, what does it bind the defendants to do? At all events it binds them, while they remain in office, to pay." So he contemplates the covenant as a covenant in force while the covenantors remain in office. Then the other judges take the same view, and CROSSWELL, J. says (at p. 753), "I am of the same opinion. The defendants first enter into a clear personal covenant, and then they endeavour, by the proviso, to relieve themselves from all personal liability"; not from some liability only, but from all liability. That agrees with what I have already said: a proviso limiting the personal liability under the covenant, that is, not destroying it, but leaving some personal liability still remaining, is a valid proviso: it is all incorporated into the covenant.—p. 549.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—It is with some reluctance that I give my judgment in this case, for my common sense is offended by the notion that this man was not a servant. But Reg. v. Bowers is a strong authority in favour of the contention raised on behalf of the prisoner. In that case a strong Court of five judges concurred in the judgment, which was delivered by Chief Justice Erle. He says that the cases decide that "a person who is employed to get orders and receive money, but who is at liberty to get those orders and receive that money where and when he thinks proper, is not a clerk or servant within the meaning of the statute." That passage exactly describes the nature of the employment of the prisoner in the present case, and in deference to that decision given as late as 1866 by a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with ourselves, I think we are bound to hold that this conviction must be quashed.—p. 403.

CAYE, J.—It is clear that the judgment in Reg. v. Glover depended upon rule 31 [of the County Court Rules, 1857], as it then stood because the bailiff was then bound to pay the money to the Court; it was not the money o the high bailiff, nor was he responsible for it. Now by Ord. II. r. 30 [of the Rules of 1875], the practice is changed, and the high bailiff may order the bailiff to pay the money to him to be paid over to the Court. . . . In the case of Reg. v. Graham . . . the prisoner was, with the sanction of the treasury, employed by the inspector of prisons. He was therefore appointed not by the inspector, but by the Secretary of State, and was possessed of such power only as the Secretary of State conferred. . . . Obviously the position of such a person is different from the position of the bailiff in the present case. He is appointed by the high bailiff, who may order him to pay the monies over to the clerk of the Court or to himself direct.—p. 502.

MATHEW, J.—In my opinion the false pretences were not too remote. The only case cited as an authority against this view is Reg. v. Larner, in which the facts were somewhat similar to those in the present case. In that case the common serjeant had to direct the jury what their finding should be on the question of fact whether or not the prisoner had won the prize by false pretences. After consulting Stephen, J., he held that the false pretences were too remote. No reasons are given for this view. The case merely records the impression of the common Lindley, J. in Reg. v. Dickenson (Times Newspaper, July 26, 1879), and that opinion is the sound one.—p. 903.

BOVILL, C.J.—In support of the conviction the case of Reg. v. Boulton was referred to. There the prisoner was indicted for obtaining by false pretences a railway ticket, with intent to defraud the company. It was held that the prisoner was rightly convicted, though the ticket had to be given up at the end of the journey. The reasons for the decision do not very clearly appear, but it may be distinguished from the present case in this respect, that the prisoner, by using the ticket for the purpose of travelling on the railway entirely converted it to his own use for the only purpose for which it was capable of being applied.—p. 565.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—It is true that in the case of Reg. v. Reed, under apparently similar facts, a different construction was put upon the Act of Parliament. It was with reference to that decision that the present case was reserved for the consideration of all the judges. I do not know how that case arose; but most likely, if investigated, it would be found to be essentially different from the present. But if it was on all fours with this, I must say I dissent from it, and must consider it overruled.—p. 82.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—The fourth and fifth counts charges directly the obtaining of the money by false pretences. The evidence was that the defendants, in order to induce the prosecutor to make the contract of purchase, made the false pretences aforesaid respecting the horses sold, and thereby induced him to buy and part with the price. A general question seems here to be raised whether, if money be obtained through the medium of a contract between the defendant and the party defrauded, the charge of false pretences can be sustained. Questions approaching this have been raised in the criminal Courts. With some plausibility, the thing obtained through the false pretence may be said to be the contract, and not the money which is obtained in fulfilment of it, and which the party is probably by its terms liable to pay. This was the ground on which my brother Littledale directed an acquittal in Reg. v. Codrington. But that decision was lately much doubted by the judges with reference to a case reserved by the recorder of London (Reg. v. Adamson, 2 Moo. C. C. 286, seems to be the case referred to). A person who falsely pretended that he was an emigration commissioner thereby induced the prosecutor to enter into a contract with him, and to pay him under it a sum of money. An objection was taken that the verbal representation could not be received in evidence, as the bargain between them was reduced to writing. But the recorder admitted the evidence; and the judges unanimously approved of his decision; and the conviction was held good. Hence it follows that the execution of a contract between the same parties does not secure from punishment the obtaining of money under false pretences in conformity with that contract.—p. 64.

RUSSELL, C.J.—I do not think that our decision conflicts with Reg. v. Holt. There the false pretence charged was a distinct and separate transaction, and the fact that the prisoner had subsequently made a similar false pretence had no bearing on his guilt or innocence of the particular charge preferred. Reg. v. Francis is nearer to the present case, and, although there it is true that the transaction admitted in evidence was prior to that on which the charge was founded, yet it seems to me that the reasoning of that case will apply here.

ALDERSON, B.—That is overruled. The intent is inferred by law. If a forged instrument is put away in order to get money or credit, that amounts to an uttering.—p. 484.

CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—Reg. v. Shukard is entitled to the highest respect, and upon similar facts we should submit to its authority. But the learned judges there did not proceed upon the distinction that to make the using of a forged negotiable instrument a felonious uttering, the intention of the prisoner must be to gain credit upon it, by making it operate as such. They appear to have thought that there the evidence was not sufficient to show an intention in the prisoner to induce the makekeeper to advance any money, or to give credit upon it to him.—p. 492.

COLERIDGE, J.—This is a case which might have raised a difficult and subtle question; but from the mode of which it has been stated by the learned recorder there appears to be a clear distinction between it and Reg. v. Ashwell. In that case the judges who were in favour of upholding the conviction did not intend to question the ancient doctrine that an innocent receipt of a chattel and its subsequent fraudulent appropriation do not constitute larceny. On the contrary, it will be seen from the judgment of one of the judges in that case he expressly accepts that rule of law. In the present case, the learned recorder directed the jury that if the prisoner innocently received the money and afterwards fraudulently appropriated it, he was guilty of larceny. It was not our intention in Reg. v. Ashwell to enunciate any such rule, and the law has been incorrectly laid down to the jury by the learned recorder; they may have thought consistently with his direction that a fraudulent appropriation six months after the original receipt would be sufficient to warrant them in convicting the prisoner of larceny. We are asked to say whether the jury were wrongly directed, and we are of opinion that they were. If the judgments of the seven judges who affirmed the conviction in Reg. v. Ashwell are carefully read, it will be seen that there is a most substantial difference between that case and the present, and that those judges were of opinion that to justify a conviction for larceny the receipt and appropriation must be contemporaneous.—p. 645.

Reg. v. Ashwell, considered.
Reg. v. Hehr (1895) 18 Cox C. C. 267; [1895] 2 Ir. R. 709.—C.C.R. (IR.).

PALLES, C.B.—Reg. v. Ashwell has not a single prior case to support it. It was a case of first impression. The ground upon which it was arrived at is given in the judgment of Coleridge, C.J., in whose mind there must have been some serious misapprehension. I hold that it would not be competent to the Court in England to uphold the conviction in Reg. v. Ashwell, and it is only by following that case that it can be upheld in the present case.—p. 272.

DENMAN, J.—The Law Journal report of each of those cases shows the real ground of decision. In the first case the goods were such that the wife could not have been the person to remove the whole of them from her husband's house, and, therefore, the prisoner received them from someone other than the wife. In the other, the prisoner was himself a party to the removal, and was guilty, not merely of receiving, but of stealing.—p. 310.

JERVIS, C.J.—In Thompson's Case there seems to have been some confusion in the use of the expression "about the person." The words of the Act are "from the person," and, with submission to the majority of the judges who held the asportation in that case not to be sufficient, I think the minority were right. The judges, in that case, may have thought that the outer coat, which covered the pocket, formed a protection to the pocket-book; but we must not fritter away the law by refining upon nice distinctions in a way to prevent our decisions from being consistent with common-sense.—p. 424.

Reg. v. Collins (1864) L. & C. 471; 33 L. J. M. C. 177; 10 Jur. (N.S.) 636; 10 L. T. 581; 12 W. R. 886; 9 Cox C. C. 497.—C.C.R., overruled.

COLERIDGE, C.J.— . . . As far as I can learn, the reversal of the conviction in Reg. v. Dodd [not reported] proceeded upon that ground—namely, that a person cannot be convicted of an attempt where he could not have completed the offence. We do not think, however, that, upon the facts, this case comes within Reg. v. Collins. For there seems no doubt that this boy could have completed the offence. It is very satisfactory to find that we are not obliged to quash this conviction, and we are all of opinion that Reg. v. Dodd cannot any longer be considered law. It proceeded on the authority of Reg. v. Collins, which was, in our opinion, decided upon a mistaken view of the law.—p. 48.

RUSSELL, C.J.—In Hall v. Richardson the man added water to the milk in order to remedy an accidental mistake. . . . Although the facts may be distinguishable from those in the present case in several respects, yet I cannot fail to see that damage was done in that case, and that the man intended to do it. He did it wilfully in order to repair a mistake. I think that that case was not rightly decided. I think with all deference that the cardinal error in the judgment is that there is a confusion between damage to the thing and consequent loss or damage to the owner of the thing. In my opinion an offence is committed against the statute if there be wilful damage to the thing, although it does not cause loss to the owner of the thing. No doubt those two results generally co-exist. That seems to me to be the first error in the judgment. But it also appears from the statement of Coleridge, C.J., that "this man . . . not with the intention to damage anybody—least of all to damage his master . . .

put some water into the remainder of the milk
. . . ." that he came to the conclusion that in order to constitute an offence under the statute there must be an intention to damage somebody.
But I think that if there is wilful damage to the thing the statute is satisfied. Lastly, Coleridge, C.J. refers to the power of the magistrate to give compensation in language which shows that in the opinion of the L.C.J. the section was confined to cases in which it would be proper to give compensation. I think that that arose from confusion in the mind of the learned judge between damage to the thing and damage to the owner of the thing, the latter of which I think the statute does not require.—p. 576.

LUSH, J.—The words, "a person entitled to vote," can only mean, without a forced construction, a person who is entitled to vote at the time at which the personation takes place; in the present case, therefore, I feel bound to say the offence has not been committed. In the cases of Reg. v. Martin and Reg. v. Cramp, the judges gave no reason for their decisions; they probably held that "supposed to be entitled" meant supposed by the person personating.—p. 148.

3. OFFENCES AGAINST PERSONS OF INDIVIDUALS.

Abduction.

Reg. v. Barrett (1885) 15 Cox C. C. 658, dissented from.
Reg. v. Bellis (1893) 62 L. J. M. C. 155; 5 R.
492; 69 L. T. 26; 17 Cox C. C. 660; 57 J. P.
441.—C.C.R.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—In the case referred to of Reg. v. Barrett, the facts of the case justified the conclusion come to there, because there was no fraud practised upon any one in that case; the child consented to go, and no fraud was practised upon any one else. . . . The dictum of Smith, J., to the effect that the force or fraud must be exercised on the child itself in order to bring the case within sect. 56 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 is not part of the decision in that case, and would not be binding over any similar case. In any case it is too wide a dictum, and I cannot but think my learned brother may have been misreported.

If it is not so, I should certainly disagree with any such direction in a case coming within the purview of such a dictum.—p. 156.

Assault.

Reg. v. St. George (1840) 9 Car. & P. 483; and Reg. v. Lewis (1840) 9 Car. & P. 523, questioned.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—I believe I speak with the assent of my learned brothers in saying this—I certainly myself desire to say it—that if upon a fit occasion, Reg. v. St. George and Reg. v. Lewis should come up for consideration, whatever may be the authority of the learned judges by whom those cases were decided—and it is needless to say higher authority could scarcely be had—the consent of my own mind is not given to them. I might be bound by them if sitting alone, but sitting in this Court, I should take the liberty to reconsider those cases, and possibly to overrule them.—p. 384.

[POLLOCK, B. desired to reconsider the first case; HUDDLESTON, B. and MANISTY, J. both cases; whereas STEPHEN, J. declined to assent to, or dissent from, them.]

Reg. v. St. George, overruled.

Reg. v. Lewis, considered.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—As regards the other case—Reg. v. St. George—I should have thought, with great deference, that it ought to have been got rid of by this time. There the prisoner raised his arm and pointed a pistol at another person, and he had his hand upon the trigger. So far as raising his arm and pointing the pistol were concerned, he did all that he could do to discharge it, and then other persons interfered and took the pistol from him, and the attempt ended there. I should think it reasonably clear to most ordinary minds that there had been an attempt to do what was prevented from being done by the interference of third persons. As to the case now before us, where the facts are of the same character as in Reg. v. St. George, I think we are all clearly of opinion that there was abundant evidence to be left to the jury, and to satisfy them, that there was the attempt charged in the fifth count of the indictment.—p. 86.

Reg. v. Hewlett (1858) 1 F. & F. 91, questioned.

Reg. v. Stopford (1870) 11 Cox C. C. 643.

BRETT, J.—I doubt the case of Reg. v. Hewlett, as it appears to me inconsistent with Reg. v. Hunt (1 Moo. C. C. 93); it seems to me to be only partially reported, a bald report, in fact. Reg. v. Smith (1 Cox C. C. 51) is precisely in point.—p. 645.

Reg. v. Martin (1881) 51 L. J. M. C. 36; 8 Q. B. D. 54; 45 L. T. 444; 50 W. R. 106; 14 Cox C. C. 633; 46 J. P. 228.—C.C.R., followed.

ESHER, M.R.—The only case which could be cited against the well-known principle of law applicable to this case was Reg. v. Pembilton, but, on examination, it is found to have been decided on this ground, viz., that there was no intention to injure any property at all. It was not a case of attempting to injure one man's property and injuring another's, which would have been wholly different.—p. 361.

Reg. v. Rundle (1855) Dears. C. C. 482; 3 C. L. R. 659; 24 L. J. M. C. 129. 1 Jur. (N.S.) 430; 3 W. R. 408; 6 Cox C. C. 549.—C.C.R., questioned.

Buchanan v. Hardy (1887) 56 L. J. M. C. 42; 18 Q. B. D. 486; 35 W. R. 453; 51 J. P. 741.—COLERIDGE, C.J., MATHEW, CAVE and SMITH, JJ.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think that . . . Reg. v. Rundle must be held to be binding, if it be binding at all, in the case of a husband only, because the judgment in Reg. v. Porter (38 L. J. M. C. 126), the case which was subsequently decided, appears to have entirely departed from the reasons upon which Reg. v. Rundle was decided. So far as can be seen no case has actually come before the Courts, and none has been cited to us, in which the particular relation of parent and child has been considered, or in which the question has been distinctly presented to them, whether a parent is or is not within this 9th section [of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96]. It is true that Parke, B., in Reg. v. Rundle did add to the question of husband and wife specifically the case of parent and child, but the general principle of domestic control was distinctly departed from in the case of Reg. v. Porter where the person convicted was a brother; and certainly it was in a case in which I was counsel for the prosecution at the Exeter Assizes, where the lunacy commissioners obtained a conviction against a brother and sister for having imprisoned . . . a lunatic brother. I never heard any question raised as to the propriety of that decision. Now we have to determine the present case upon this principle, and I must say, with deference to the learned judges who decided Reg. v. Rundle, that I am not altogether satisfied with the reasons they gave for their decision in that case.—p. 44.

Meredith* the following passage:—"To support a charge of assault you must show an assault which could not be justified if an action were brought for it, and leave and hence pleaded," and having argued that it was there assumed that an assault might be confessed and avoided by a plea of leave and licence.]

is clearly bad as to the assault. . . . An assault must be an act done against the will of the party assaulted; and, therefore, it cannot be said that a party has been assaulted by his own permission.—p. 477.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the rule laid down in the first case of Reg. v. Fletcher (Bell C. C. 63) was quite right, and I do not think that in the second case of the same name the Court intended to depart from it. In every case the question must be, whether there is sufficient evidence to support the charge, and, where mental incapacity is involved, the question must be one of degree. Now, in the first case of Reg. v. Fletcher and in the present case, the degree of idiocy was very great. In the second case it was much slighter. And in that case the question reserved was, whether the judge ought to have left the case to the jury, there being no evidence against the prisoner except the fact of connection and the imbecile state of the girl. And what the judges held was, that in that case there ought to have been some further evidence. I do not think they at all meant to overrule the earlier case, but only to say that in the particular case before them they did not think there was evidence to go to the jury.

PALLES, C.B.—Reg. v. Barrow was decided . . . on a case reserved by Kelly, C.B., which . . . stated that he thought the case "was made out as . . . the act itself, coupled with the pushing aside of a baby the prosecutrix had in her arms, amounted to force, and there was certainly no consent before, and the reverse immediately afterwards." The case was heard by five judges of whom Kelly C.B. was not one. No counsel appeared for either the Crown or the prisoner, and the case is disposed of in the following words by Bovill, C.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court: "It does not appear that the woman . . . was asleep or unconscious at the time when the act of connection commenced. . . . It must be taken therefore that the act was done with the consent of the prosecutrix, though that consent was obtained by fraud. It falls, therefore, within the class of cases which decide that where consent is obtained by fraud, the act does not amount to rape." The judgment, by excluding the applicability to cases where the prosecutrix was asleep or unconscious, adopts the judgment in Fletcher's Case (supra, col. 775), but it seems to have there escaped attention that one of the effects of that judgment was to abolish the old distinction between such absence of consent as must exist in rape, and that which will constitute an assault. This would have made not only the circuit decisions of Reg. v. Saunders (8 C. & P. 285) and Reg. v. Williams (8 C. & P. 286), but the ruling of that Court itself in Reg. v. Case (1 Den. C. C. 580) authorities for the prosecution, and would have called for a determination of the distinction there taken by Wilde, C.J. and Platt, B. between the act consented to and the act committed. Thus the cardinal point in the case, the point upon which alone it must have been concluded by the judge at the trial, "there was certainly no consent," was wholly lost sight of in the decision.—p. 589.

WILLIAMS, J.—The question [proposed to be put by counsel] in the present case is as to previous intercourse with the prisoner, and the question in Rea v. Hodgson was as to intercourse with other men. I shall certainly receive the evidence, and I must say that I never could understand the case of Rea v. Hodgson. The doctrine that you may go into general evidence of bad character in the prosecution, and yet not cross-examine as to specific facts, I confess, does appear to me to be not quite in strict accordance with the general rules of evidence.

HAWKINS, J.—In that case [Reg. v. Wealand] the prisoner was indicted in one count simply for the felony of carnally knowing a girl under thirteen. The evidence of the girl, though not upon oath, was received under sect. 4 [of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885], and upon that charge it was clearly admissible within the express language of the statute. The jury found the prisoner not guilty of the felony, but, being satisfied that he was guilty of an indecent assault, they, under the express provision contained in sect. 9 of the Act, found him guilty of such assault. But for this section, they would have been bound to acquit him altogether. Now in that case no objection could have been made to the unsworn testimony, for the 4th section expressly made it admissible upon the only count which the jury had to dispose of, and in authorising the jury under that count to convict of an indecent assault, though no indecent assault was charged, the legislature must be taken to have intended them, in the consideration of their verdict, to deal with all the evidence before them, forgetting that the exception to the general rule of evidence was not made to extend to charges other than those in sect. 4. I was a party to the judgment, and agree in all the observations of the L.C.J. in delivering it, and I venture to think they are rather in favour of than against my view of this case. In the present case, upon the first count no doubt the evidence was admissible, but upon that count the jury had no power to convict of an indecent assault; while upon the second count, which was for an indecent assault simply, the evidence was inadmissible. It is strangely anomalous to suppose that a person being acquitted upon a charge on which unsworn evidence was admissible, should nevertheless be lawfully convicted on such evidence upon a count on which it was wholly inadmissible. To my mind such a proposition is contrary to reason, good sense and law. I note particularly an observation in the judgment of the L.C.J. in Reg. v. Wealand, that the anomaly therein pointed out "may lead to a prisoner being indicted for the graver offence under sect. 4, when it is known that he can only be convicted of a less offence under sect. 9 on unsworn testimony given in support of the charge under sect. 4." On this I can only say that, should such a course be adopted, I should look upon it as a scandalous abuse of the law with a view to convict the accused of a grave offence upon evidence known to be inadmissible, if the indictment were confined to an honest statement of the real charge.—p. 143.

HAWKINS, J. said that case was no authority for the proposition. All that it decided was that the terms of a complaint were only admissible as evidence of a want of consent by the prosecutrix, and not as evidence of the truth of the charge against the person named in the complaint.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—Neither of these cases is very satisfactorily reported; in neither was there any motive for questioning the dicta of the judges; in the one, tried by Lord Esher, then Mr. Justice Brett, there was no opportunity, in consequence of the prisoner having been acquitted on all the counts to which the alleged ruling applied. We are well aware of the great authority of the judges by whom the two cases above mentioned were decided, but we are unable to concur in these dicta, and, speaking with all deference, we think they are not law. It seems to us that to hold that the very same acts which are expressly legalised by statute remain nevertheless crimes punishable by the common law, is contrary to good sense and elementary principle, and, that the reports, therefore, cannot be correct. If the dicta are law, they render the statutes passed on these subjects practically inoperative: the statutes might as well not have been passed. The dicta are criticised in detail and with great ability in Mr. Justice Wright's excellent work on the Law of Criminal Conspiracies and Agreements, pp. 50—59. It is difficult to withhold consent from the statements and reasonings contained in these pages, and it seems to us that the law concerning agreements or combinations in reference to trade disputes is contained in 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, and in the statutes referred to in it and that acts which are not indictable under that statute are not now, if indeed they ever were, indictable at common law.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—I am not prepared to say that the combination which has been entered into between the parties to this bend would be illegal at common law, so as to render them liable to an indictment for a conspiracy. Such a doctrine may be deduced from the dictum of Grove, J., in Rex v. Mawbey (p. 636). "As in the case of journeymen conspiring to raise their wages, each may insist on raising his wages if he can; but if several men, for the same purpose, it is illegal, and the parties may be indicted for a conspiracy." Other loose expressions may be found in the books to the same effect; and, if the matter were doubtful, an argument might be drawn from some of the language of the statutes respecting combinations. But I cannot bring myself to believe, without authority, much more cogent, that, if two workmen who sincerely believe their wages to be inadequate, should meet and agree that they would not work unless their wages were raised, without designing or contemplating violence, or any illegal means for gaining their object, they would be guilty of a misdemeanour, and liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment. The object is not illegal, and, therefore, if no illegal means are to be used, there is no indictable conspiracy.—p. 62.

TINDAL, C.J.—But then it was urged by the learned counsel for the Crown that, supposing these objections to be well founded, this defect in the allegation of the conspiracy was cured by referring to the whole indictment—the part stating the overt acts as well as that stating the conspiracy; and Rex v. Spragg was cited as an authority that the whole ought to be read together. The point decided in that case appears to have been merely this, that, in an indictment for a conspiracy, though the conspiracy be insufficiently charged, yet, if the rest of the indictment contains a good charge of a misdemeanour, the indictment is good. Lord Mansfield distinguishes between the allegation of the unexecuted conspiracy to prefer an indictment, as to the sufficiency of which he gave no opinion, and that of the actual preferring of the indictment maliciously and without probable cause, which he calls a completed conspiracy actually carried into execution; and this he holds to be clearly sufficient: and no doubt it was so; for, rejecting the averment of the unexecuted conspiracy, the indictment undoubtedly contained a complete description of a common law misdemeanour. But if we examine the allegations in this indictment, there is no sufficient description of any act done after the conspiracy, which amounts to a misdemeanour at common law. None of the overt acts are shown by the averments to be indictable.—p. 808.

That was an indictment for a conspiracy to go into a preserve in the night time, and armed with offensive weapons in search of game, which in itself is an indictable offence, and an agreement to commit an indictable offence undoubtedly amounts to a conspiracy.—p. 388.

WILLES, J.—Every lawyer is well aware that although the Label Act, 32 Geo. 3, c. 60, applied more particularly to criminal cases, yet there is no distinction in this respect between the law in criminal cases and that in civil; and that the opinion of the dissentient judge (Wilkes, J.) in the case of Rex v. The Dean of Asaph is the proper exposition of the law.

8. AGAINST PUBLIC MORALS AND POLICE.

Bigamy.

Reg. v. Fanning (1866) 17 Ir. C. L. R. 289; 10 Cox C. C. 411; 14 W. R. 701.—C.G.R. (IR.). disapproved.

COCKBURN, C.J. (for the Court).—We cannot agree with Fitzgerald, B. in his judgment in Reg. v. Fanning, that the purpose of the statutes against bigamy was simply to make polygamous marriages penal, and that, consequently, it was only intended to constitute the offence of bigamy where the second marriage would, but for the existence of the first, be a valid one; or with those judges, who, in Reg. v. Fanning, found their judgments on the assumption, that in applying the statute against bigamy, the second marriage must be one which, but for the first, would be binding. Polygamy, in the sense of having two wives or two husbands at one and the same time for the purpose of cohabitation, is a thing altogether foreign to our ideas, and which may be said to be practically unknown; while bigamy, in the modern acceptance of the term, namely, that of a second marriage consequent on an abandonment of the first while the latter still subsists, is unfortunately of too frequent occurrence.

Reg. v. Orgill (1839) 9 Car. & P. 80, doubted.
Yelverton v. Longworth (1864) 4 Macq. H. L. 745; 10 Jur. (N.S.) 1209; 11 L. T. 118; 13 W. R. 235.—H.L.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—It is made a part of the respondent's case that a marriage took place by a Roman Catholic priest at Rostrevor, in Ireland, on the 15th August, 1857; but it appears that there was in force in that country an Act of the Irish Parliament of the 19 Geo. 2, c. 13, s. 1, which provides that every marriage, if celebrated by a Popish priest, between a Papist and any person that hath been, or hath professed himself to be, a Protestant at any time within twelve months before such celebration, shall be null and void to all intents. I cannot feel any doubt that, according to that law, this marriage was void. The appellant, having been born and bred a Protestant, of a Protestant family, and always treated as such, must be deemed to have continued so, unless he had done something to denote a change of his religious persuasion; and nothing of that sort appears. I have no doubt that he was a Protestant, within the meaning of that Act, and am fully supported in that opinion by those of the learned judges, Christian and Keogh, which I have read since the hearing of the case, and which are extremely full, able, and satisfactory. They are reported in Theoball v. Yelverton (14 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 188). He did not say he was a Roman Catholic to the priest, but that he was a "Protestant Catholic." Had he said he was a Roman Catholic it would have raised the question reputed to have been decided by Alderson, B. in Reg. v. Orgill in 1839, whether he was not estopped by his declaration that he was Roman Catholic. I must say I doubt greatly of the propriety of that decision and agree with an opinion of Monahan, C.J., to that effect, referred to in the argument. That his statement in that case would be evidence against him is undoubted, but that it operates as an estoppel, is a very different proposition; but it is not necessarily now to be discussed and decided. I think it clear therefore that there was no valid marriage in Ireland.

BOVILL, C.J.—If the facts had been clearly stated in the report of Reg. v. Orchard, it may be that we should have been bound by that case, but I must confess that I am unable to understand the exact facts, or the judgments applied to them, as there reported. GASELEE, J. (after consulting LORD TENTERDEN, C.J.).—My Lord Tenterden agrees with me that the opinion of Garrow, B. in Rex v. Fagg is much too general, as it would go to exclude any acknowledgment of guilt made by a prisoner to a constable. [Garrow, B. had stated his opinion that nothing which a prisoner stated, before he knew what the evidence against him was, ought to be used to criminate him.]

CAVE, J.—Undoubtedly, when persons are speaking on even terms, and a charge is made, and the person charged says nothing, and expresses no indignation, and does nothing to repel the charge that is some evidence to show that he admits the charge to be true. But, where a statement is made in such circumstances that the prisoner cannot repel the charge, it is absurd to say that his remaining silent is any evidence of the truth of the charge. In this case, where a woman was lying on her deathbed, and her evidence was being formally taken, the last thing in the world to be expected is that the prisoner should have started up and denied it, and said that all the woman was saying was untrue, especially where she was represented by a solicitor and knew that her solicitor would be allowed to ask questions in turn, and that everything would be done for her which could be done. It would in my opinion be simply monstrous to say that because she did not do so, that is to be taken as evidence of her guilt. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, notwithstanding Reg. v. Mann, in which I think my learned brother must have been misreported, that this statement is not admissible in evidence.—p. 508.

SIR J. COLERIDGE (for J.C.).—It is alleged, and so far as their lordships are aware, truly, that according to the universal impression among lawyers, no such power exists as the Court below has exercised in this instance ; and, further, that but a single case is reported in which an application for a new trial in felony has been made, and but one—the same case, of course—in which it has succeeded. That case occurred in 1851, and although, as is well known, the public attention has been very much drawn to the subject during the interval which has since occurred, and it cannot be doubted that verdicts have since been pronounced which might have seemed questionable, no attempt has been made in this country to press the authority of that case in support of a similar application. On a matter of such importance it is right to consider that case attentively, and it is fortunate as to the freedom with which their lordships may deal with it, that two of them who have taken part in the hearing of this appeal, also took part in the decision then arrived at. Reg. v. Scaife, Smith and Rooke, was a case of an indictment for felony, found at the Hull borough sessions, and removed by certiorari. The trial was at the York assizes, before the late Cresswell, J., and, in the course of it, a deposition of a living witness, not produced, was tendered on the part of the prosecution, there were grounds which applied only to Smith, on which it was admissible as against him ; the counsel for the prisoner objected to its reception, but the learned judge overruled the objection, and rightly,—he admitted it, as is said, "subject to the objection" ; the meaning of which probably was, that he might upon consideration have referred his ruling to the Court of Criminal Appeal. But in summing up he left the evidence generally to the jury, omitting to tell them that the deposition could affect Smith only. Singularly enough, the jury convicted Scaife and Rooke, and acquitted Smith. In the following term a rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, on the grounds of improper evidence and misdirection. The case was argued at some length, and neither in the course of the argument, nor in the judgments which followed, was a syllable uttered on the points now in question ; the attention both of the counsel and the judges seems to have been exclusively confined to the questions of evidence and misdirection ; but after the judgments pronounced, making the rule absolute, this occurred : the counsel for the rule suggested that there was a difficulty in ascertaining what rule should be drawn up, "no precedent having been found for a new trial in felony." Upon which Lord Campbell is reported to have said, "That might have been an argument against our hearing the motion." Still, however, the rule was made absolute, and a new trial, in fact, took place.

It appears, then, from this examination of the case, that a most important innovation in the practice of our criminal law was here made without a word of argument at the bar upon it, or the attention of the Court having for a moment been addressed to it, until after the opinion of all the judges had been expressed on the point really debated. And, as has been already stated, the decision has taken no root in our law, and borne no fruit in our practice. Are their lordships to be bound by it in the advice they are now to tender to her Majesty ? It is somewhat embarrassing, even apparently, to disregard any judgment of the Court of Q. B. ; but, in truth, when examined, this can scarcely be said to be a judgment upon the point now to be decided ; substantially, the Court decided, and decided rightly, the only question directly for consideration, namely, that of the reception of evidence and misdirection, and for that alone the decision is properly an authority. That they adhered to it in spite of the consequences involved, after it was pointed out to them, is true, and their lordships now venture to say, to be regretted; for, at all events, it would seem that if such an innovation were to be made, it should not have been made without argument or indirectly. Their lordships, therefore, will feel at liberty to consider the present case apart from this authority.—p. 531.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The only case in which a new trial was granted was Reg. v. Soaife, and that was not a misdemeanour but a felony—a distinction which at that time was of the greatest importance—an importance which modern legislation has almost entirely removed. If, therefore, that case stood uncommenced upon and practically unreversed, and had been followed, it would have been an authority strongly in point here. It would, to quote from the judgment in Att.-Gen. of New South Wales v. Bertrand (4 Moo. P. C. (N.S.) 460), have worked a revolution in the practice of the criminal law. But, as Sir J. Coleridge there explains, the point now under consideration was not presented to the Court in Reg. v. Soaife, and the decision cannot be said to be a judgment upon it, but a decision given per incuriam, afterwards admitted to be wrong. It stands, therefore, that the case has never been followed in these Courts, and has been deliberately overruled in a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, in which were two of the judges who were parties to the original decision.—p. 96.

MELLOR, J.—The observations of Lord Campbell in *Reg. v. Whether there is any satisfactory distinction between that case and the present may be open to question; but if there is none, I should act on the opinions of the other judges rather than on Lord Campbell's.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The judgment [in Reg. v. Clark], which was very short, was delivered by Cockburn, C.J., who said: "In this case we have no jurisdiction. It was not a question arising on the trial; for the man pleaded guilty, and he must be taken to know the law. The power to state a case for the consideration of this Court only applies to questions of law which arise on the trial." If those words mean that because a man pleads guilty, any defect in the statement of the case against him is immaterial, and that he is precluded from afterwards taking advantage of such defect, and that even the judge who tried him cannot state a case asking for the opinion of this Court, respectfully differ from the decision. In this case the indictment was read to the prisoner, and if he had then taken the objection, it would clearly have been a point arising on the trial; and the mere fact that he did not take it, but that it occurred to the judge afterwards, does not make it the less a point which arose on the trial. We think therefore, that we have jurisdiction to consider this case. Reg. v. Clark is not, moreover, directly in point, for there the question was whether the facts stated in the depositions supported the indictment. The present case is distinguishable, because here the question is as to the sufficiency of the indictment itself, which must needs have been gone into.—p. 48.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think this case is to be distinguished from Reg. v. Yates. That case arose on a trial for manslaughter and the principal person interested was dead. . . . But in this case the person interested is the wife of the prisoner, the person upon whom the assault, with the commission of which the prisoner is charged, was committed. I understand the magistrates expressed no opinion on the point, and I think that the wife had rights, of which she ought not to be deprived. Where there is a private prosecutor, and that prosecutor conducts the case before the magistrates, I do not think the magistrates' clerk ought to step in and take the case out of the prosecutor's hands. The wife will therefore be allowed the costs of the prosecution.—p. 369.

LORD WATSON (for J.C.).—Now although it was decided by this board in Gould v. Stuart that the effect of the Civil Service Act, 1884, was to deprive the Crown of its right to dismiss its civil servants summarily, without following the procedure prescribed by the Act, it was certainly not suggested that the provisions of the Act do, either directly or by implication, take away the right of the Crown to abolish a civil office.

SELBORNE, L.C.—All that I will say is this: In Alexander v. Wellington (Duke) there was a claim between Messrs. Alexander and Lord Hastings. The trustees, if I am so to call them, had actually paid the money to Lord Hastings, or had done what was the same thing, had paid it into Court, in a suit between himself and one of his creditors, and it was to be distributed simply according to the private rights of the parties, between Lord Hastings and his creditors. With that we have nothing to do; but the question whether the fund could be put into trust in this way and administered, was determined upon appeal by Lord Brougham as Lord Chancellor, and was distinctly determined by him upon the following footing, though the trustees had been directed to collect and get in certain funds, and to prepare a scheme of distribution, which they had done, and though two subsequent warrants of the Crown had confirmed the distribution made by them, Lord Brougham distinctly held that in order to determine whether they were trustees or not, in such a sense as to introduce the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, the instrument making the grant, and nothing else, was to be looked to, and that the subsequent Acts could not make it a trust to be administered in the Court of Chancery if it was not so by virtue of the instrument itself; and upon the instrument itself he said he had no doubt whatever that the question on the merits was wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the Court.

A previous decision by Lord Eldon in Brown v. Harris has been referred to in the course of the argument. There, no doubt, the Crown did grant a fund to trustees in every sense of that word, the fund being distinctly vested in them, and vested for the purposes for which they were made trustees, and the power of the Crown who had made the grant being entirely at an end over the matter. Of course, that is quite possible, and there the Court of Chancery might exercise its ordinary jurisdiction. That cannot be doubted, but the question is whether this instrument is of that kind.—p. 890.

JOHNSON, J.—In Poole's Case, notwithstanding that I invited the attention of counsel to the question whether an application for certiorari was the proper course in that case, the counsel on both sides passed by that question, and addressed their arguments entirely to the merits of the application. That motion for a certiorari was refused, but in giving my reasons for concurring with my brother Lawson, I pointed out (and I believe with the approbation of my learned brother) that the usual and ordinary course would have been to proceed in that case by writ of error, and, therefore, that if I had entertained any doubt upon the case made for the prisoner, I should have hesitated before granting a certiorari, but that as I entertained no doubt I concurred that the motion for certiorari ought to be refused. Poole's Case, therefore, is not an authority for the present application.—p. 643.

SMITH, J.—Upon the materials before the Court in Lilley v. Dorin, the decision was right. But the Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872, has been brought before us, and it is said that it applies to the Mayor's Court. Apart from authority, the only meaning which can be given to rule 12 in the schedule to that Act is that no case in the Mayor's Court shall be removed by writ of certiorari into a superior Court, unless the parties can persuade a judge that the case is fit to be tried in a superior Court. But it is said that in Synmonds v. Dinsdale there was a judicial interpretation of a statute of which the language is identical with that before us, and that we are bound to say that, in spite of rule 12, there is a common law right to remove a case by certiorari if the amount is over 50*l*. But, on looking at the case, it appears that Platt, B. made an order at chambers ex parte for a certiorari, to remove a case from the Oxford County Court, he thinking the case to be one which was fit to be tried in a superior Court. The motion in the Court of Exchequer was to rescind the order, on two grounds. First, that the plaintiff ought to have had notice of the intention to apply for the certiorari, and secondly, that the writ was not properly tested. Those were the only grounds decided; and that case does not fetter that which is plain from rule 12—namely, that the leave of this Court must be obtained before a writ of certiorari can be issued.—p. 294.

LORD HERSCHELL.—If, in order to support this judgment, it were necessary to give my adhesion to the law laid down in Reg. v. Barnardo, Tye's Case, I should hesitate much before doing so. Having regard to the nature of a writ of habeas corpus and the purpose for which it was designed and has hitherto been employed, I cannot feel satisfied, as at present advised, that it is not a good return to the writ that the person to whom it relates was not at the time it was issued in the custody, power, or control of the person upon whom it is served. The doctrine that it must also show that before the writ was issued, or before he had notice of the application for its issue, he had not wrongfully parted with the custody of the person named in the writ is novel, and appears to me to involve great difficulty. A gaoler who has allowed a prisoner to escape has wrongfully parted with the custody of that person. Could he be commanded by a writ of habeas corpus, issued after the escape, to produce him, and be committed for contempt of court if he failed to do so? Other illustrations might be given to show the difficulty of assenting to the broad proposition laid down in the Court of Appeal. . . . The very basis of the writ is the allegation, and the prima facie evidence in support of it, that the person to whom the writ is directed is unlawfully detaining another in custody. To use it as a means of compelling one who has unlawfully parted with the custody of another person to regain that custody, or of punishing him for having parted with it, strikes me at present as being a use of the writ unknown to the law and not warranted by it.—pp. 732, 733.

WRIGHT, J.—Of course we deal with that case with all possible respect as a decision which binds us in pari materia; but there the Court was not dealing with a question of this kind. I have never heard that decision questioned, and I do not suppose it ever will be. It was a civil dispute, and it held that the remedy by action of mandamus was the applicant's proper remedy. But there is one expression in it which the learned judge is, I think, incautiously reported to have made, that it is an answer to any application for a prerogative mandamus if it be shown that a mandamus could have been granted for the same purpose in the action. I say, and I have said with the assent of other judges at various times, that this would be unduly narrowing the powers of this Court to grant a prerogative mandamus. There must be very many cases in which prerogative mandamus is a thing which ought to be granted for the purpose of speedy justice, or other reasons, where it would take a long time and be very difficult and very uncertain whether the same results would be arrived at in any other way. I do not think that Reg. v. Lambourn Valley Ry. governs this case, and we have no doubt that the practice which has been inveterate for years of enforcing the taking up of these awards by prerogative writ of mandamus is a proper remedy.—p. 698.

Lords Commissioners of the Treasury*, I confess it is case with which I cannot agree. It is put upon the ground, that a relation was established between the parties of depositor and depositor; that is to say, although the money had been paid by the Crown into the hands of the Commissioners of the Treasury, it never having been the money of the claimant, yet the Commissioners of the Treasury, by the acts which they had done, but as in common law it would be called, attome to the claimant and agreed to hold the money for him. The moment that they came to this conclusion, they showed that he could have maintained an action for money had and received against the Commissioners of the Treasury, and if so, of course a mandamus ought not to have issued. I cannot agree, therefore, that upon this grounds put by the Court in that case, it was proper decision. If it were a decision which could be upheld, and I think it cannot, it is an authority for saying that where that relation has not been raised by the acts of such Commissioners, a mandamus would lie to them. If a mandamus would have lain to them if it had not been for that attornment, I cannot conceive I must say frankly, that, sitting here, I consider that the case of Rex v. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury cannot be maintained on any ground.—p. 475.

CAMPBELL, C.J. said that he had great respect for the Bench, and that he learned judge, but that, if he did say that a mandamus would lie in that case, he could not agree with him. But that he doubted whether he did say it, for in the report of the same case in the Queen's Bench Reports no such dictum appeared.

 WILLES, J.—Secondly, however, it was objected that, looking to the pleadings, the sum payable for the license was not alleged to be a fixed, but only a reasonable compensation, which must necessarily vary from time to time; and so that the custom was void for uncertainty; or that, looking to the evidence as to payment of a fixed sum in connection with the change in the value of money during the period over which the payment ran, the custom must be unreasonable or impossible. This argument is founded upon a supposed difficulty in sustaining a custom for a reasonable payment, not being a fixed and arbitrary sum, but capable of varying in nominal amount with the value of money from time to time; and it derives considerable authority from the judgment of the majority of the Court of Q. B. . . . in the late cases of Bryant v. Foot and Lawrence v. Hitch, where the learned judges dissented from what they considered to be a novel assumption of this Court in the judgment in Shepherd v. Payne, that a customary fee need not be of an amount fixed before legal memory, but may be of reasonable amount, like a toll. It is observable, however, that Bramwell, B., in the Ex. Ch. [Shepherd v. Payne], and the dissentient judge, Blackburn, J., in the Queen's Bench [Bryant v. Foot], adopted the opinion of this Court; and further, that the attention of the majority of the Court of Q. B. does not appear to have been directed to the authorities which sustain customary or prescriptive claims for reasonable amounts, such as Blackstone's Commentaries 78, where the nature of a valid custom in respect of certainty is explained, nor to the authorities, such as Com. Dig. tit. "Toll" (D), Dunbar v. Wigglesworth (1752) Willes 654, and Gard v. Callard (1817) 6 M. & S. 69, which show that toll of a reasonable amount may be claimed by grant or by prescription, which stands upon the same footing as custom; nor to the opinion of Lord Holt in Dalton v. Gerard (1700) Holt 596, who seems to have taken for granted that there may be a reasonable fee annexed to an ancient office (which fee, as Blackburn, J., said in Bryant v. Foot, may in process of time have become taxed at a given sum); nor to the circumstance that fees to the church were not fixed in ancient times—see judgment in Miller v. Say (1742) Willes 631, n.; nor to Layburn v. Crisp (1838) 8 L. J. Ex. 118; 4 M. & W. 320, where a custom to have the exclusive right of unloading oysters in the port of London, and to receive a reasonable sum for so doing, was upheld at a trial at bar; nor, in short, to any of the authorities for applying the familiar principle, "id certum est quod certum reddi potest," to the maintenance of a custom; which principle was acted upon, though it was not thought necessary to recite it, in Shepherd v. Payne. And the reason of the thing is, as we conceive, in accordance with the authorities. Thus, a custom to pay such or such a measure of corn would be good; and therefore a custom to pay in money the value of that measure of corn must be good, and if to pay the value of a measure of corn, why not pay the value of any other commodity or advantage capable of estimation? We cannot, therefore, as at present advised, decide against the custom upon this ground.—p. 216.

KELLY, C.B.—The matter comes to be a question of authorities; but among these there appears to be an irreconcilable difference. On the one hand we have Abbot v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling, and on the other, [Millechamp v. Johnson], the case reported in the note to Bell v. Wardell. In the latter case it was held that a custom for all the inhabitants of a town for the time being to have and enjoy the liberty and privilege of playing at any rural sports or games in a close every year, at all times in the year, at their will and pleasure was a bad custom. It was not so held on the ground that the expression "at all times in the year" was too general, for that expression was held not to mean more than at all reasonable times; but only on the ground that the custom as laid down was too general. Some sports may occupy the whole surface of the land, and thus this custom might take that entire surface out of the possession of the owner at all times. This I take to be the ratio decidendi in that case; but on the other hand we have Abbot v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling. In the first of these it was held that the dancing there mentioned might be held at all times of the year, and, taking the two cases together, they show that all lawful games and pastimes may be used at all times. I think we ought to give effect to those authorities, as being of more weight than that on the other side.—p. 3.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Denn v. Spray is a direct authority against the plaintiff in the present case.—p. 126. [His lordship discussed that case and also Doe v. Sisson.]

WILLIAMS, J.—It was contended, however, on the part of the defendants, that a custom of this nature cannot be properly said to exist beyond the instances in which it can be shown to have actually prevailed and been put in use. And certainly Lord Coke is reported to have so laid down the rule in Ratcliffe v. Chaplin, and this direction was cited and relied upon in the Court of Q. B. in Denn v. Spray. But the more modern authorities are, I think, quite irreconcilable with it. Thus, it was held in the subsequent case of Roe v. Parker, that an ancient presentment by a homage of the customs of a manor was sufficient evidence as to a descent, though no evidence was adduced of any person having taken under it; and Lord Kenyon said, that if the decision of Denn v. Spray went as far as to determine that such a document is not admissible in evidence, unless instances in fact are previously proved to warrant the introduction of it, he must beg leave to dissent from it. And Grose, J. observed, that it must be remembered, there are considerable inaccuracies in the report of that case, and he thought Lord Coke meant to comment on the credit which was due to the evidence, rather than its admissibility. This was followed by Doe v. Sisson. There the custom proved by particular instances, was, that the eldest sister, and, if she were dead, the son of such eldest sister, succeeded; but there was no instance of any descent beyond that. And the question in the cause was between the grandson of an eldest sister and the sons of two younger sisters. But one witness stated the reputation to be, that the eldest sister should take, and if all were dead, the descendants of the eldest sister. The Court of Q. B. held in that case, that upon this evidence it was properly left to the jury to determine whether the grandson of the eldest sister was entitled to the whole, although there was no proof of such extended custom having been put in use. The present case, in itself, affords an example of the difficulty of applying the doctrine, that the custom shall only prevail as to descendants of which instances can be proved. For if the contest had been whether the custom extended to uncles, it must have been held that by reason of the want of an instance, there was no evidence of the custom extending so far as them, notwithstanding the instance of its descending further in the case of their sons. To carry this illustration a step further: suppose that in the present case there had been on the rolls a further instance of this kind of descent in the case of the children of a first cousin, would it not be more reasonable to infer that the custom extended to collaterals generally, than to suppose that any lex loci could have been instituted so whimsical as to extend to first cousins once removed, and yet exclude uncles and first and second cousins? It may be further observed, that Denn v. Spray was decided, not only on the ground that the custom was not shown to extend to collaterals, but also upon the peculiar wording of the custom, as contained in the customary of the manor, namely, "si aliquis tenens hujus manerii obierit," &c., which necessarily excluded nephews and nieces, inasmuch as they make out their claim or pedigree through their father or mother, who never was a tenant of the manor, and consequently could not have died seised, and on whom therefore the custom as to the course of descent never attached. For this reason, as well as those given by my brother Bramwell, in his judgment in the Court of Ex., we may well hold, that Denn v. Spray was rightly decided, without overruling the decision of the learned judge at the trial of the present case.—p. 127.

GROSEWELL, J.—It has been suggested that if Denn v. Spray be taken as a decision that a custom can only be proved by evidence of its being acted upon, it was overruled in Doe v. Sisson. In that case an estate was claimed by the grandson of an eldest sister of the person last seised. Entries on the court rolls proved that copyholds descended to an elder sister, to the exclusion of a youngest sister, and the son of an elder sister inherited to the exclusion of the children of younger sisters; and evidence was given that the reputation of the custom was that the more remote descendants of the eldest sister took. This evidence was objected to; but the Court held that it was rightly admitted. I quite agree in that opinion, but what was the reputation! That a custom, or, as I explain it, a course of acting existed in the manor. The reputation was, therefore, evidence, perhaps not very cogent, but still evidence of the fact of lands having descended in that manner. It was, therefore, evidence of an act done, and in perfect accordance with Denn v. Spray.—p. 129.

ERLE, J.—The defendants relied on a rule supposed to be laid down in Denn v. Spray, that a custom can be proved only by instances of usage entered on the court rolls. For this rule the Court relied on the language of Lord Coke in Ratcliffe v. Chaplin, that the party maintaining the custom must show precedents on the court rolls to prove the usage, and that it had been put in use, and that although it had been deemed and reputed to be the true custom, yet the Court could not give credit to the proof by witnesses. But this rule is not supported by the decision cited for it. The point for decision in Ratcliffe v. Chaplin was, whether a new trial should be granted on the ground of the verdict being against the evidence; and, as there were conflicting entries; the remarks which the Court adopted in Denn v. Spray were extra-judicial, pertinent only to an observation of the jury that they knew the customs by reputation. Moreover, it is clear that the rule so adopted in Denn v. Spray was overruled in Doe v. Sisson, where evidence of reputation was held sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the custom extended to more distinct degrees than could be found entered on the court rolls; and this decision in Doe v. Sison was confirmed and acted upon by Lord Cottenham in Loche v. Colman.—p. 130.

COLERIDGE, J. to the same effect as CRESSWELL, J.

COCKBURN, J. (after discussing Ratcliffe v. Chaplin, continued): Denn v. Spry went, however, a step further. It was there held, that where it was shown that the custom that, as amongst females, the eldest only should inherit, extended not only to daughters but to sisters, it could not thence be inferred that the custom extended to the case of an eldest niece (of which there was no actual instance); although in a customary of the manor, which the Court recognised as legal evidence, it was expressly declared that no tenements within the manor were divisible, whether amongst heirs male or female. The Court admits the authority of Ratcliffe v. Chaplin to its fullest extent, treats the customary of the manor as entitled to no weight, and adopts the language of Lord Coke in its most general sense, without at all referring it to the subject-matter to which it was in truth applied, and lays it down that, as custom cannot be extended further than the actual instances on the court rolls establish it, I am bound to say, that the judgment in that case appears to me to be unsatisfactory and inconclusive, and to have proceeded upon a misapprehension of the scope and the effect of the judgment in Ratcliffe v. Chaplin. Its authority seems to have been very much shaken by the subsequent case of Doe v. Sison. . . . If the rule contended for upon the authority of Ratcliffe v. Chaplin and Denn v. Spry be the correct one, and were to prevail, it is extremely probable that this extraordinary and anomalous state of circumstances would arise, that while the son of the youngest uncle could inherit, the uncle himself, though nearer in degree, could not; a consequence so obviously absurd, as forcibly to illustrate the unsoundness of the doctrine from which it would spring.—pp. 133, 134.

[Note.—The majority of the Court, COLERIDGE, WIGHTMAN, CRESSWELL and CROMPTON, JJ. (COCKBURN, C.J., ERLE and WILLIAMS, JJ. dissenting), held that there was no evidence to show that the custom extended to authorise the descent to the youngest son of the youngest brother of the great-grandfather of the person last seized.]

COTTON, L.J.—But, no doubt, it must be shown that the acts of the defendant are acts of user in connection with his particular tenement; and that, I think, is shown, because what is proved in respect of this defendant and his predecessors in title is, that they cut the litter in respect of and for the use of their farm only; and as that was so, the right was exercised in respect of that tenement, and is connected with the tenement, i.e., with the possession and occupation of the tenement and the ownership of the tenement. That, in my opinion, entirely distinguishes the case from the two cases on which the plaintiff relied. . . . One was Blewett v. Tregonning, and all that was laid down was to this effect: "It must be pointed out to the jury that they must be satisfied that the occupiers of the firm enjoyed the privilege because they were occupiers, and that the right was attached to the farm." . . . The other case, which at first sight seemed more in favour of the respondents, was Hammerton v. Honey. In that case what was attempted to be asserted was a claim of all the inhabitants of a village to use a green for the purpose of recreation. The evidence given was that all people, whether of the village or not, had used it; and it was held that this evidence would not support a claim of right in respect of the inhabitants of that village. Some of the persons who used it happened to be inhabitants of the village, but there was no distinction at all between their user and that of all the rest of her Majesty's subjects, and therefore the user by all her Majesty's subjects as such, the villagers not using it as villagers but as her Majesty's subjects, did not afford any evidence in support of the claim sought to be established.—p. 537.

STIRLING, J.—It was contended that the case was governed by the decision in Lanchbury v. Bode, which related to the same land. The payment which had to be considered in that case, however, was of a different kind, and Kekewich, J., in dealing with it, says that "when the question comes to one of a charge on land there is quite a different question to be considered." Moreover in Lanchbury v. Bode, from the nature of the payment, the effect of sect. 66 of the Inclosure Act had not to be considered.—p. 81.

(who dissented from the majority), said: This case [Hadley v. Baxendale] is, therefore, an authority that in a similar case such loss of profit cannot be made an element of damages, and must be excluded; but it is an authority no further, and anything said by the Court in delivering judgment, is to be judged by its being consonant to law and reason. . . . I do not adopt the qualifications mentioned by Alderson, B. in the judgment in Hadley v. Baxendale as applicable to every case. They may have been perfectly right there, but they are not of universal application. . . . As to Hadley v. Baxendale, I was a party to it, and have no desire to depreciate it, but in Boyd v. Fitt the Court of Ex. in Ireland dissented from it, and approved of the views of Crompton, J. in Smeed v. Foord, and Wilde, B. in Gee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry., as being sounder expositions of the law as to remoteness of damages.—p. 100.

POLLOCK, C.B.—Hadley v. Baxendale was cited at the trial, and much commented on during the argument. That case was very much considered. The argument took place several weeks before the judgment was given, and I know that great pains were bestowed upon it. Lord Wensleydale, the late Alderson, B. and my brother Martin were parties to it, and it is due to Lord Wensleydale and the late Alderson, B. to say that a more extensive and accurate knowledge of decisions in our law books, and a more acute power of analysing and discussing them, and, as far as my brother Martin is concerned, in addition, a larger acquaintance with the exigencies of commerce and the business of life, never combined to assist at the formation of any decision. And, certainly, it does not lessen the authority of that case that Lord Campbell, in Smeed v. Foord, said—in that it merely affirmed what was to be found in Pothier,—in 2 Kent's Com. 665, in the French Code,—and in all the other authorities; and it may be added, that Crompton, J. (against whose summing-up it was directed), in that same case, said he agreed with it as far as it went,—which we consider to be agreeing with it altogether. That decision was not presented as any new discovery in jurisprudence; but we think it put in a clearer and more distinct light a principle which had been previously recognised in prior cases, and the want of which, in the English law, had been pointed out. The authorities are all collected in a note to Ticars v. Wilcocks, [2 Smith's Leading Cases, 5th ed. 461].—p. 103. CHANNELL and PIGOTT, BB. concurred.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I may point out in conclusion, what to my mind is the utter dissimilarity between this case and that of Hadley v. Baxendale. There there was delay in the delivery of a chattel, and the plaintiff claimed certain damages—not done to the chattel itself but consequential upon the delay which he had proved. Here the damages done are done to the individual carried, and not damages in consequence of his non-arrival at a particular place at a particular time. The analogy would apply more to the case of goods of a different value than to consequential damages for delay, as in Hadley v. Baxendale.—p. 236.

There a phreton had been injured by the defendant's negligence, and the true owner might at any time have demanded that the defendant should pay for the repair of the damage, not on account of any contract existing between them, but on account of the injury which the true owner had sustained. The damage to the phreton might have been treated as a tort. I must confess, however, that I feel a very great distrust as to the propriety of that decision, because if the person from whom the defendant had hired it had remained solvent, he would have been entitled to recover full damages. Upon the other hand, Carv v. Roberts seems to me rightly decided.—p. 284.

BRETT, M.R.—The very point was carefully dealt with in The Parana, where the question arose as to the application of that rule [as laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (supra, col. 808)]. The case of a loss of market by delay arising from a collision was considered incidentally to that case, though it was not the point of the actual decision. Mellish, L.J., said that loss of market in the sense that persons are entitled to the difference between the price when the goods arrived and the price when they ought to have arrived, is on an ordinary voyage so uncertain that it cannot be the natural and reasonable consequence in every case. And, therefore, it is not the natural and reasonable result of a collision at sea. That case is an authority binding upon us. For my part I do not wish to say that, if I had to decide that case, I should have decided it differently. I can see no distinction between the principles there laid down and those which we have now to apply. There was in The Parana an action of contract, and here the question arises upon an action of tort. But in the passage which I have read from Mayne on Damages (3rd ed. p. 39), which is founded on Hadley v. Baxendale, no distinction is made between the two kinds of actions in regard to damages. I agree that upon the question of remoteness there is no difference between actions upon contract and those not upon contract.—p. 113. BOWEN and PRY, L.J.J. concurred.

GROVE, J.—In that case the existence of the sub-contract was known to the seller at the time of the sale, or at all events the fact was known to the seller that the goods were purchased for a specific purpose, and that, delivery being required for that specific purpose, the buyer would incur loss by such non-delivery as would prevent his effecting that specific purpose. So that the seller must be taken to have had notice either of the sub-sale or that the goods were bought for some specific purpose, that is, in general terms, that he had knowledge of the purpose for which the goods were bought. The loss arising when that purpose could not be carried out was something which the parties to the contract may be taken to have contemplated as a result of breach of contract, and the case is really a modification of Hadley v. Baxendale (supra, col. 808).—p. 458.

HALSBURY, L.C.—The law laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (supra, col. 808) in 1854, as to the measure of damages in an action of contract, has been treated for nearly half a century as a guiding rule. The rule is that where two parties have made a contract, which one of them has broken, the other party is entitled to recover in respect of such breach such damages as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as a probable result of the breach of it. . . . But for Baxendale v. L. C. & D. Ry. . . . and Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalt Co., which followed it, I should have thought it impossible to contend that it was not a reasonable consequence of the defendants' breach of contract that the plaintiff had to enter upon a contest which resulted in a successful resistance to an extravagant claim for damages. I can draw no distinction between the costs of legal proceedings reasonably incurred in this manner and the cost of the attendance of a surgeon upon a man wounded by a tort; and, apart from the authority of those cases, I should have thought that these costs were within the rule, and that the plaintiff could recover them. But, undoubtedly Baxendale v. L. C. & D. Ry. must be considered. This former case in one respect, because there the plaintiff had continued the action previously brought against him in the face of an opinion of counsel that he had no possible defence, and his defence was in fact unsuccessful. That state of facts constituted an argument against allowing the plaintiff to recover the costs of the former action, which it was difficult to get over; and had the decision dealt with those facts only, I should have thought it clearly right, and it would not have been difficult to deal with in this case. But unfortunately the judges who decided the case thought it right in delivering their judgments to express opinions which I must admit are not in conformity with those I am now expressing. But then, on the other hand, I have here a decision of the C.A. in a later case—Hammond & Co. v. Bussey—which is inconsistent with those opinions. It is impossible to read the judgments of Bowen and Fry, L.J.J. in that case without seeing that they differed from the opinions expressed by the judges in Baxendale v. L. C. & D. Ry., which, I think, may be said to be obiter dicta, because they were not necessary for the decision of the case. The two cases, I frankly admit, cannot stand together, and in those circumstances we must, I think, follow the later decision, which is, moreover, in accordance with the law laid down in the older cases. At the same time, I think that the actual decision in Baxendale v. L. C. & D. Ry. can be supported on the different facts of that case.—p. 316.

KEATING, J.—I further think that the rule laid down in Brown v. Muller as to assessing damages is to be applied to the present case in what I may call cy-pres. The judgments pronounced in that case by the C.B. and my brothers, Martin and Channell, though undoubtedly mere obiter dicta, . . . are however of great authority. . . . The difficulty here has arisen from Hochster v. De la Tour [(1853) 22 L. J. Q. B. 455; 2 El. & Bl. 678; 17 Jur. 972; 1 W. R. 459. See "CONTRACT," col. 670], which was the first case in which it was decided, with reference to an executory contract, that notice of the refusal by one of the parties would entitle the other to treat it as a breach, and bring his action before the time for performance. Hochster v. De la Tour has been recognised by several subsequent decisions and is fairly now established as law, and we must assume it to be law. It has, however, introduced a difficulty which did not before exist as to the assessment of damages. That case was followed by Frost v. English [(1873) 41 L. J. Ex. 78; L. R. 7 Ex. 111; 26 L. T. 77; 20 W. R. 471.—EX.—] and "CONTRACT," col. 670; and though it was not necessary there any more than in Hochster v. De la Tour to assess the damages, Cockburn, C.J. in delivering the judgment of the Court, laid down to my mind a similar rule for assessing the damages, as is referred to by the learned judges in Brown v. Muller, and that is that the period of time at which the difference between the market and contract price is to be determined is that at which the contract should have been performed if it had continued to exist; in other words, the measure of damages is the difference between the price of the goods if the contract had been performed and the market price at the times when they ought to have been delivered. Such prices are liable to be mitigated by any circumstances which may have that tendency.—p. 67.

COCKBURN, C.J.—That case amounts to this, that where a party has lost custom by not being able to get to a place at the time he wished, the pecuniary loss arising is too remote to be the subject of damages. That may be true, because in each case you would have to go into the question whether there was a loss, and you would have to assess that loss, and it would be difficult, on the principle laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (supra, col. 808), to say that the company could have in their contemplation, as a probable result of the breach of contract to carry to the place of destination, all the circumstances that may result from a detention. But the case is not an authority that personal inconvenience should never be taken into consideration; and if it had so held I should not agree with the decision.—p. 51.

MELLISH, L.J.—Now, I agree that, as a general rule, what is said by Alderson, B., in Hamlin v. G. N. Ry., is correct, namely: "The principle is that if the party does not perform his contract the other may do so for him as near as may be, and charge him for the expense incurred in so doing." I agree also with what is said by the judges of the C. P. D. that this rule is not an absolute one applicable to all cases, and that the question must always be whether what was done was a reasonable thing to do, having regard to all the circumstances. This, however, is a very vague rule, and it is desirable to consider whether any more definite rule can be laid down. Now, one mode of determining what, under the circumstances, was reasonable, is to consider whether the expenditure was one which any person in the position of the plaintiff would have been likely to incur if he had missed the train through his own fault, and not through the fault of the railway company. The rule that what is reasonable under peculiar circumstances may be discovered by considering what a prudent person uninsured would do under the same circumstances, is applicable to many cases besides those which arise under policies of marine insurance. I think that any expenditure which, according to the ordinary habits of society, a person who is delayed in his journey would naturally incur at his own cost if he had no company to look to, he ought to be allowed to incur at the cost of the company if he has been delayed through a breach of contract on the part of the company, but that it is unreasonable to allow a passenger to put the company to an expense to which he could not think of putting himself if he had no company to look to.—p. 530.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—In my opinion Hamlin v. G. N. Ry. offers no support to the plaintiff's argument, but in the report in the Law Journal Reports, Alderson, B., is stated to have made the following observations in the course of the argument:—"The plaintiff might have taken a post chaise and charged it;" and again [His lordship read the passage cited above and continued:] Now I think these observations of Alderson, B., which do not appear in the report of the case in Hurlstone and Norman, must be considered as having been made with reference to the particular case before the Court, and not as intended to lay down an absolute principle applicable to all cases however different in their circumstances. . . . Brett, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court [below], is reported to have said:—"We think, that the rule attributed to Alderson, B. in Hamlin v. G. N. Ry. is a good expression of the law. We think it may properly be said that, if the party bound to perform a contract does not perform it, the other party may do so for him as nearly as reasonably may be, and charge him for the reasonable expense incurred in so doing." This appears to me to be a more correct enunciation of the principle applicable to such cases than the particular words attributed to Alderson, B.—p. 535.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—In Hobbs v. L. & S. W. Ry., it was said that the damage to the wife was a secondary consequence of the breach of contract and too remote; and, by way of illustration, the case was given of a person walking home in the dark who took a false step which resulted in a fall and a broken limb; but I must say I do not see why a passenger who, by the default of the railway company, was obliged to walk home in the dark might not recover in respect of such damage, it being an event which might not unreasonably be expected to occur.—p. 594.

BRETT, L.J.—Then it is said that the case is governed by that of Hobbs v. L. & S. W. Ry.

Now I must confess that if I acquiesce in that case I cannot quite agree with it. What were the facts there? A man with his wife and children took a ticket by the train to Hampton Court, his residence being between two and three miles from Hampton Court. The train did not go to Hampton Court, but took them to Esher station where they were turned out at about twelve o'clock on a wet night, and being unable to get any conveyance or accommodation at an inn, were obliged to walk about six miles to their home. The wife in consequence of the exposure caught a cold, and it was said that such damage was too remote to be recovered. Why was it too remote? There was no accommodation or conveyance to be obtained at Esher at that time of night, so that it was not only reasonable that they should walk, but they were obliged to do so. Why was it that which happened was not the natural consequence of the breach of contract? Suppose a man let lodgings to a woman and then turned her out in the middle of the night with only her night clothes on, would it not be natural consequence that she would take a cold? Had Esher station been a large one, and there had been five which might have been had, or accommodation at an inn, and the passengers had refused that and had elected to walk home, I should have thought then that what happened arose from their own fault, but that was not so, yet, nevertheless, the judges who decided Hobbs v. L. & S. W. Ry. decided, as a matter of fact, that the cold was so improbable a consequence, that it was not to be left to the jury whether it was occasioned by the breach of contract. It is not, however, necessary for me to say more than that I am not contented with it, for there is a difference between such a case and the present one.—p. 596. COTTON, L.J. concurred.

CAVE, J.—The words of sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, subs. 2, are—"Any Court may direct any debt due from any person in pursuance of any order or judgment of that or any other competent Court, to be paid by instalments, and may, from time to time, rescind or vary such order." The words "such order" obviously refers to the order of the Court directing payment by instalments. The County Court, therefore, may order payment by instalments of the amount due on an order or judgment of the High Court, and may rescind or vary its own order; but when the High Court has itself directed payment by instalments of its own judgment, the County Court has no power to vary that order. This is all that was decided by the judgment in Washer v. Elliott. The judgment in that case proceeds on the extravagance of a construction which would have enabled an inferior Court to rescind or vary the order of a superior Court for the payment of a judgment debt by instalments, and so make the inferior Court a Court of Appeal over the superior Court (p. 669).

I have attended to that, as I should to anything that fell from that learned judge, but it seems to me that he has not taken the right view. The view he has taken is inconsistent with that taken by the Court of Exchequer in Jones v. Jenner, and it seems to me that the more reasonable view was that adopted by that Court.—p. 770.

JESSEL, M.R.—We have been referred to Esdaile v. Visser. Every remark of JAMES, L.J. is entitled to great respect; but when his lordship says that it would require an overwhelming case to induce the Court of Appeal to differ from the judge if he says he is satisfied of the debtor's ability to pay, I think the adjective rather too strong. I agree that it requires a strong case; indeed, we never ought to overrule the question of the Court below on a question of fact, unless it is clearly made out that the decision is wrong, and probably JAMES, L.J. meant no more than this. In that case, moreover, the lord justice observes that all the materials had been before the judge. In the present case we have before us important materials which were not before the Court below. . . . The case of Harper v. Seringour is of no weight on the present occasion. The judges there came to a particular conclusion of fact, and their doing so does not bind even a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction to come to the same conclusion in any other case. We cannot tell why the judges came to that conclusion; they may have had reasons for disbelieving the debtor's evidence, and no rule of law can be deduced from the case.—p. 181.

CHITTY, L.J.—In the absence of authority upon the subject, it might have been competent to us to decide that the effect of sect. 4 of that Act (the Judgments Extension Act, 1868) is not to limit the operation of sect. 3, but merely to provide for the control over registered judgments in so far only as relates to execution under the Act; but it appears to me that the question is no longer open in this Court, and that In re Watson has already decided that the effect of sect. 4 is to limit the operation of sect. 3 to execution upon the judgments registered under that section. The issuing of a bankruptcy notice is clearly not a process of execution upon the judgment. Therefore the case comes exactly within the authority of In re Watson. The case of In re Lou . . . was . . . merely a case of a Court of equity imposing equitable terms when asked to grant an injunction. I do not see that there is any direct conflict between that case and In re Watson. The latter case was not cited in In re Lou, nor was sect. 4 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, alluded to; and the Court of Appeal do not seem to have assumed in any way to overrule the decision in In re Watson.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court)—Although Cobham v. Dalton was decided in 1875, and Middleton v. Chichester was decided in 1871, and the lords justices who decided Cobham v. Dalton were members of the Court which decided Middleton v. Chichester, the view there taken and expressed with reference to the punitive character of sect. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, seems to have been overlooked by them. Lord Justice James does not allude to it; Lord Justice Mellish said: "Now arrest for debts is intended as a means of enforcing payment, not as a punishment, for if the party pays the debt he is entitled to be discharged." This observation was true of ordinary debts: In re McWilliams (1 Sch. & Lef. 169); Lees v. Newton (L. R. 10 C. P. 658); but not of obligations to pay under orders made under sect. 4, sub-sect. 3 of the Debtors Act, 1869. The punitive character of sect. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, which was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester has been since so often recognised that it cannot now be questioned; see Morris v. Ingram (ante, col. 820); In re Gent (40 Ch. D. 190); although the Court has, under the Act of 1878, a discretion to grant or refuse an attachment, in cases falling within it; and in one of the latest cases, viz., Aylesford (Baro) v. Penderel (Baro) (1892) 2 Ch. 60) an attachment against a defaulting trustee was refused. In re Boyley (15 Q. B. D. 329), In re Manning (30 Ch. D. 480), Preston v. Etherington (37 Ch. D. 104) and Mitchell v. Simpson were referred to in the course of the argument; but they are not decisions upon the effect of sect. 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon commitments under sect. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. In these cases, however, the fact that a commitment under that section is not to be regarded simply as a form of civil process, but as punitive, is distinctly recognised. Having regard to the Debtors Act, 1878, and to the decisions to which we have referred, it would be clearly wrong now to apply Lord Justice Mellish's observations in Cobham v. Dalton, above quoted, to obligations to pay money in obedience to orders made under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4, sub-s. 3.

[Exchange Bank of Yarmouth v. Blethen was a case in which a deed of assignment by debtors to a trustee for the benefit of all creditors who should execute the deed was executed by the plaintiffs, who appended a note that they executed only in respect of certain claims scheduled to the deed, and amounting to 73,531 dollars, and it appeared that subsequently thereto they received a sum of money from the trustee by virtue of their execution of the deed. It was held that they were bound, as the note did not amount to a refusal to execute, and having received payment under the deed, they could not be heard to repudiate it and deny their execution.]

SIR R. COLLIER (for J.C.).—The case mainly relied on in support of the contention that the qualified execution amounted, in law, to no execution at all, was that of Wilkinson v. Californian Gold Mining Co. . . . It appears to their lordships that this case, which affirms an undoubted principle of law, does not apply to the present. The note appended to the plaintiff's execution of the deed does not, in their judgment, amount to a non-execution, or a refusal to execute any part of the deed; it is at least capable of being interpreted as descriptive of the amount of debt which the plaintiffs intended to claim, being considerably more than that which is set opposite to their names in Schedule A., coupled with an intimation that they did not mean to claim more, and in this view it would not amount to a non-execution of the deed.—p. 298.

Lewis v. Davies (1837) 2 M. & W. 503.

PARKE, B. (for the Court).—The only objection which can be raised as to the operation of the deed is, not that the intent to raise a use was not plain, but that the intent was to raise that use out of the seisin of the trustees, and not out of that of the grantor: and that such intent could not operate, as the trustees could not, it is admitted, take any estate at all: and this objection was grounded on the authority of the case of Hore v. Dix, where it was held that a covenant with strangers, that they should hold the land to the use of the grantor for life, with remainder to the son, was void. But Lord Justice Willes considers this very objection in the case of Roe v. Tranmarr, and intimates his dissatisfaction with that decision upon this point. He says that he should have been of another opinion, "because in a covenant to stand seised, the estate properly arises out of the estate of the grantor, and his intent that it should not, I think, signifies nothing: for though his intent is to be regarded as to what estate is to pass, and to whom, it is not at all to be regarded as to the manner of passing it (of which he is supposed to be ignorant), if it were, it would overturn almost all cases." And though the learned Chief Justice distinguishes the case then under consideration from that of Hore v. Dix and Samon v. Jones, there can be no doubt but that the learned editor of the valuable edition of Saunders's Reports is right in stating, in his note in Chester v. Willan (2 Saund. 97), that Hore v. Dix and Samon v. Jones are in effect overruled by this decision.—p. 517.

COTTON, L.J.—It is said, and said truly, that neither wax nor wafer is necessary in order to constitute a seal to a deed, and that frequently, as in the case of a corporation party to a deed, there is only an impression on the paper; and

In re Sandilands, was referred to, where an instrument had been forwarded from the colonies, together with an official certificate of its having been duly acknowledged, and this was recognised by the Court as a deed, although there was no seal, but only the ribbon on it. That case is not now under appeal, but it is evident that the question was merely as to what was the true inference of fact, and although perhaps, having regard to the certificate, it was right then to say that the deed had been sealed, here, in my opinion, it would be wrong to do so. It is true that if the finger be pressed upon the ribbon that may amount to sealing, but no such inference can be drawn here where the attesting witness who has given evidence recollects nothing of the act, and when Jackson had already committed no fraud in the matter, and then perhaps attended another.—p. 11.

Sandilands (or Mayer). In re, distinguished. Smith, In re, Oswell v. Shepherd (1892) 7 L. T. 64.—C.A. LINDLEY, BOWEN and KAY, JJ.
BOWEN, L.J.—It seems to me that Re Sandilands was an exceptional case, and that the decision there depended upon the particular facts of that case. It does not justify the Court, whenever a document is produced before it, rich, though bearing no seal, purports to have been sealed, in assuming that it has actually been sealed. I cannot see my way to assuming as fact in the present case.—p. 66.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The leading case on the subject is Berridge v. Ward, which is a very strong case. That case decides that "where a piece of land which adjoins a highway is conveyed by general words, the presumption of the law is that the soil of the highway issue ad medium filium, passes by the conveyance, even though reference is made to a plan annexed, the measurement and colouring of which would exclude it." The question in this case is whether there are circumstances sufficient to exclude that presumption. In the first place it must be borne in mind that it is a rebuttable presumption. . . . we cannot find this little bit of land which is in dispute specified in any description of the parcels, either in the deed, or in the schedule, or in the plan. That, however, is not enough, having regard to Berridge v. Ward, to exclude the presumption. But when we come to look at the recital as to the trees and at the trees included in the valuation, it appears to me that the learned judge has decided this case rightly upon that recital and upon those trees. The trees which were valued were trees on the property agreed to be sold. It is not as though the recital had been that the trees were to be ascertained by valuation and so on; but it is a recital of what the parties agreed was to be conveyed. We ask what trees are conveyed, and we find they do not include those on this strip of land. It may be that any one of the facts I have mentioned would not be conclusive, but when you join them all together I think that there is sufficient to rebut the presumption.—pp. 531, 532.

ROMER, J. (during the argument).—The dictum of Cockburn, C.J. in *Leigh v. Rudall, where the deeds were in Court, and Wood, V.C. stated the rule thus: "With respect to the title deeds, it is a settled doctrine that this Court never interferes as to the possession of deeds between a father tenant for life and a son entitled in remainder; but in the case of a stranger tenant for life the Court will interfere; and this is, in fact, a particularly strong case, because the deeds are in Court, and I am asked to deliver them out. The reversioner has no connection with the tenant for life, the title deeds must remain in Court." There is a dictum of Lord Hardwicke in Pyncent v. Pyncent to the same effect, but it is quite contrary to law, for the mere fact of the reversioner being a stranger to the tenant for life has nothing to do with the question.

BOWEN, L.J.—The Irish cases are upon an Act which, so far as this section [sect. 5 of 7 Anne, c. 20] is concerned, is exactly in the same terms. But what is the object of the Irish Act? The preamble shows that it was to secure not merely publicity, but authenticity, genuineness—to strike not merely at secrecy, but to strike at forgery, and, as is well known, not only was the condition of things in Ireland at that time different from the condition of things in England, but great importance was attached by the legislature to the difference which existed between the state of the two countries. As the object of the Irish statute was not merely to secure publicity, it may well be that the Court thought that if the wider construction which we are now adopting were put upon the words "witnesses to the execution," the entire objects of the legislature would not be secured, because it is obvious that a precaution against forgery would thus have been omitted. If proof of the execution by the grantee only were sufficient, there would be no security as to the genuine execution by the grantor, and it may be on that ground that the Court of Exchequer Chamber felt themselves bound to come to the conclusion to which they did in Jack v. Armstrong, which was afterwards followed in Re Stephens.

STIRLING, J.—These authorities are, no doubt, of great value, but they relate to the cancellation of void or voidable instruments (as is shown by the case of Thornton v. LINDLEY, L.J.—He [Kekewich, J. in the Court below] appears to us to have decided the case in her [the plaintiffs'] favour upon an erroneous view of the law as laid down in Williams v. Bayley. . . I have explained, we have all explained, in dealing with Jones v. Merionethshire Permanent Benefit Building Society (65 L. T. 685), that in order to invalidate a transaction of this kind you must prove one of two things: either an agreement not to prosecute, which we can dismiss from our minds here; or pressure and undue influence. It is not the law that, if a lady makes a sacrifice to get her husband out of a scrape, she can necessarily impeach the security which she gives, even although the result is to "stifle a prosecution."

LINDLEY, L.J.—Fleming v. Newton in the H. L. and Annaly v. Trade Auxiliary Co. in the Irish C. A. show that the mere publication of what appears in the register of County Court judgments is a privileged publication. That being so, it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove something more than a mere publication of the extract. Here there is no evidence of express malice on the part of the defendant. The existence of the note to the effect that it is probable that a large proportion of the judgments have been satisfied distinguishes the present case from Williams v. Smith. HERSCHELL, L.C.—The utmost that the Western Counties Manure Co. v. Evans* is an example—namely, where the defendant has intentionally published an untrue statement regarding the plaintiff's business, and thereby has in the ordinary course caused damage to the plaintiff. Here the untrue statement related to the defendant's own business: and I may point out that, if it affected the plaintiff's business at all, it did not affect it exclusively.

 DE GREY, L.C.J.—I know of no case where even an action for words was grounded upon eventual damages, which may possibly happen to a man in a future situation, notwithstanding what the Chief Justice throws out in Walden v. Mitchell, where he is made to say "that where a man had been in an office of trust, to say that he behaved himself corruptly in it, as it imputed great scandal, so it might prevent his coming into that, or the like office again, and, therefore, was actionable." I think the Chief Justice went too far.—p. 188.

Lumby (or Lumley) v. Allday (1831) 1 C. & J. 301; 1 Tyr. 217; 9 L. J. (O.S.) Ex. 62.

BAYLEY, J. (for the Court).—The plaintiff relied on the rule laid down by De Grey, C.J. in Onslow v. Horne, "that words are actionable when spoken of one in an office of profit, which may probably occasion the loss of his office, or when spoken of persons touching their respective professions, trades, and businesses, and do or may probably tend to ruin damage." The same case occurs in Sir Wm. Bl. Rcp. 753, and there the rule is expressed to be "if the words be of probable ill-consequence to a person in a trade or profession, or an office." The objection to the rule as expressed in both reports appears to me to be that the words "probably" and "probable" are too indefinite and loose, and unless they are considered as equivalent to "having a natural tendency to," and are confined within the limits, I have expressed in stating the defendant's objections, of showing the want of some necessary qualification, or some misconduct in the office, it goes beyond what the authorities warrant.—p. 305.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have to face decisions which show that when a person is merely accused of unfitness for an office of honour (not of profit, with which we are not dealing), that unfitness must be one which would expose him to the risk of removal from the office which he fills, or seeks to fill. That this is the law was settled at least as early as Onslow v. Horne, when De Grey, C.J. reviewed some previous decisions, and I can find no doubt thrown on that doctrine in any case which has been decided since. It has been recognised more or less in subsequent cases, and neither in Gallwey v. Marshall nor in Lumby v. Allday do we find that that principle has been doubted. I do not know that it was expressly sanctioned in the last-mentioned case, but I think it was in Gallwey v. Marshall.

LOPES, L.J.—In my judgment, words imputing want of integrity, dishonesty, or malversation to any one holding a public office of confidence or trust, whether an office of profit or not, are actionable per se. On the other hand, when the words merely impute unsuitableness for the office, incompetence, or want of ability, without ascribing any misconduct touching the office, then according to the decision in Alexander v. Jenkins, no action lies, where the office is honorary, without proof of special damage. It is said that this view is contrary to the recent case of Alexander v. Jenkins; but a careful perusal of that case leads me to a different conclusion. [His Lordship referred to passages in the judgments in that case.] Alexander v. Jenkins is, therefore, no authority for the contention of the defendant, and in the absence of authority I should hesitate long before I held that words imputing gross misconduct in the discharge of the duties of a public office were not actionable per se, even where that office was an office of credit or honour.

BOWEN, L.J.—The present case is not, strictly speaking, one of "privileged occasion." In a legal sense that term is used with reference to a case in which one or more members of the public are clothed with a greater immunity than the rest. But in the present case we are dealing with a common right of public criticism which every subject of the realm equally enjoys—the right of publishing a written criticism upon a literary work which is offered to public criticism. It is true that a different metaphysical exposition of this common right is to be found in the judgment of Willes, J., in Henwood v. Harrison. That learned judge and the majority of the Court of Common Pleas seem to have treated this right as a branch of the general law of privilege, and to have found a justification for the use of the word "privilege" in the subject-matter of the criticism, although there is no limit of the number of persons entitled to make the criticism. With great respect to Willes, J., I agree with the Master of the Rolls that this is not so good an exposition of the right as that which is given by Blackburn, J. and Crompton, J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode. . . . Among other reasons why I prefer the view of Blackburn, J. and Crompton, J., is this, that it leaves undisturbed the mode of directing the jury in cases of this class which has been ordinarily adopted, viz., to begin by asking them whether they think the limits of fair criticism have been passed. That implies that there is no libel, if those limits are not passed.—pp. 282, 283

ESHER, M.R.—It is true that, in respect of statements made in the course of proceedings before a Court of justice, whether by judge, or counsel, or witnesses, there is an absolute immunity from liability to an action. The ground of that rule is public policy. It is applicable to all kinds of Courts of justice; but the doctrine has been carried further; and it seems that this immunity applies wherever there is an authorised inquiry which, though not before a Court of justice, is before a tribunal which has similar attributes. In Dawkins v. Lord Roakey

the doctrine was extended to a military Court of inquiry. It was so extended on the ground that the case was one of an authorised inquiry before a tribunal acting judicially, that is to say, in a manner as nearly as possible similar to that in which a Court of justice acts in respect of an inquiry before it. This doctrine has never been extended further than to Courts of justice and tribunals acting in a manner similar to that in which such Courts act.

ESHER, M.R.—Williams v. Freer, which was tried before me, was wholly different to the present case: there the defendant, who was the plaintiff's master, thought that she had committed a felony, and had her written to her father or mother to come and see to her, no doubt his written communication would have been privileged, it being a communication made to the girl's legal guardians. Unfortunately he did not adopt this humane course, but sent a telegram to her father, in which he charged her with felony, which telegram was necessarily read and copied by the telegraph clerks; and the Court held that such a mode of transmitting the communication was not privileged, for it was not merely a saying of the things to the father in the presence of somebody else, but was a separate saying of them to the telegraph clerks. . . . The effect of what the Court said in this case (Purcell v. Sowler) was, that, though the occasion was privileged as regards the time and place at which the words were spoken, and as regards the person who spoke them, yet the matter was not one of public interest, and therefore the publication in the newspaper was not privileged.

ESHER, M.R.—Mr. Baron Fitzgerald there [in Waring v. M'Caldin] said: "If, without express malice, I make a defamatory charge, which I bona fide believe to be true, against one whose conduct in the respect defamed has caused me injury, to one whose duty it is or whose duty I reasonably believe to be, to inquire into and redress such injury, the occasion is privileged, because I have an interest in the subject-matter of my charge, and the person to whom I make the communication has, on hearing the communication, a duty to discharge in respect of it." That statement is, no doubt, true; but the learned judge has interpolated the words, "or whose duty I reasonably believe it to be." . . . I do not myself think they were intended to be put in, but if they were then I am unable to agree with them (p. 590). There [in Tompson v. Dashwood] a letter containing defamatory statements of the plaintiff was written by the defendant under such circumstances as would have made the communication of it to the person to whom the defendant intended to send it a privileged communication; but the defendant put it by mistake into a wrong envelope and sent it to another person, and the Court there held that such communication was privileged. I think the Court intended to make and did make a distinction between the writing of the letter and the publication of it. If that be so, I am unable to agree with it. It is not the mere writing of a libel, but the publication of it, which gives a cause of action. The Court, therefore, could not properly draw any distinction between the writing and its publication. The real question is whether the publication was made on a privileged occasion. I think that the only way in which we can deal with Tompson v. Dashwood is to say that we cannot agree with it, and that it was wrongly decided.—p. 591

LORD CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—In Blagg v. Sturt a different opinion appears to have been entertained; and if that had been a solemn decision, the ratio decidendi being that such a memorial, bona fide addressed to the Secretary of State, is an actionable libel, we should have felt ourselves bound by it, and referred the defendant to a Court of error for the purpose of having the doctrine reviewed, although a distinction might have been taken between the office of town clerk and clerk to the justices of a borough, and the office of justice of the peace for a county. But the substantial difference between the two cases is, that in Blagg v. Sturt, there was express malice (p. 354). . . . We think that the authorities considerably outweigh the reasoning of the Court in Blagg v. Sturt on the incapacity of the Secretary of State to give redress; and that as the defendant is found by the jury on reasonable evidence to have presented the memorial to the Secretary of State bona fide for the purpose of obtaining redress, we are bound to say that he is not a libeller, and to give judgment in his favour.—p. 358.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—The result, therefore, of the rule in Harrison v. Bush is that where a man has gone down to trial to prove untrue allegations to be true, he is to receive the costs of the witnesses whom he adduced to prove that falsehood. Nevertheless, as I have said, I think that we ought not to alter a rule of such a standing, more especially since it is one of such a kind that the order of the judge at nisi prius who tries the action can remedy any injustice to which it may give rise. It is quite true that in Harrison v. Bush the judges say that the general question of the truth or falsehood of the alleged defamatory words is material on the issue of express malice. I say that that is not so. It may be or it may not be. It depends on the circumstances of the case.

ESHER, M.R.—In Pullman v. Hill & Co. this Court held that if a merchant dictates to a clerk in his office matter concerning a customer or any one else which, if sent by the merchant himself to a customer, would be sent on a privileged occasion, the communication so made to the clerk is a publication of that matter to the clerk on an occasion which would not be a privileged occasion. The ground of that decision was that it was not the ordinary business of a merchant to write libels to or about his customers, and that if he does write what is libellous it is not reasonably necessary in the ordinary course of business to give it to be copied by a clerk in his office. . . . The case of solicitors, however, is very different from that of merchants. . . . the letter which was so sent to the plaintiff would, if it had been written and sent to her by the solicitors' clients, have been sent on a privileged occasion, and the solicitors are entitled to claim that it is privileged. . . . If it was the duty of a solicitor to write such a letter on behalf of his client on a privileged occasion, does it not follow that it is his duty to do so in an ordinary and reasonably necessary way for the purpose of enabling him to perform that duty to his client. . . . I think that where the occasion would be privileged as between himself and the person to whom he writes the letter, upon the ground that if it had been written by his client it would be privileged, the occasion on which it is communicated to his clerks for the purpose of being copied into the letter book, that being a necessary and reasonable way of carrying out his duty to his client, would also be a privileged occasion, and he would not be liable in an action for libel unless malice in fact were proved.—pp 402, 403, 404

GAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—We are next to consider whether the rule ought to be simply discharged, so as that the verdict for the plaintiff should stand. It was certainly held in Tuson v. Evans, where there was a communication by letter, to which the occasion afforded privilege, that, there being a comment in excess of the privilege, the judge was justified in directing the jury that it was a libel, and leaving to them only the question of damages. But, upon referring to other authorities, we are of opinion that, wherever there is evidence of malice, either extrinsic or intrinsic, in answer to the immunity claimed by reason of the occasion, a question arises which the jury, and the jury alone, ought to determine. This has been the universal course where extrinsic evidence of malice has been adduced. . . . These authorities, we think, outweigh the decision in Tuson v. Evans, which passed only on refusing a rule for a new trial, the defendant's counsel rather arguing that there had been no excess than that the question should have been left to the jury.—p. 341.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—Ten judges in Dr. Sutherland's Case (5 State Trials, 328) delivered an unanimous opinion (no others being present) that "by the law of England and constant practice, in all prosecutions by indictment or information, for crimes or misdemeanours by writing or speaking, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, ought to be expressly specified in the indictment or information." There seems to be no reason for any difference in this respect between civil and criminal cases, the action arises ex delicto. The words supposed to be used by Lord Hardwicke in Nelson v. Dixie, were merely thrown out by Nisi Prius, and not material to the point ruled by him in that cause, and they are evidently founded on a mistake; as there are no such precedents in Rastall as he supposes. Unless the very words are set out by which the charge is conveyed, it is almost, if not entirely, impossible to plead a recovery in one action in bar of a subsequent action for the same cause.—p. 116.

BAYLEY, J.—Upon the great point, viz., whether it is a good defence to an action for slander, for a defendant to show he heard it from another, and at the same time named the author, I am of opinion that it is not. Lord Northampton's Case was undoubtedly mentioned without disapprobation by Lord Kenyon (in Davis v. Lewis), a man of very powerful mind, acute discrimination, and great learning. But whatever respect I may feel for the memory of that noble and learned judge, I cannot carry that respect so far as to surrender my own judgment.—p. 269.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—One authority (*Baldwin v. We cannot, therefore, act upon that case.—p. 233.

A. L. SMITH, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.JJ.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—That was a case in which the defendants sold a newspaper containing the libel complained of, and the jury, in answer to questions put by the judge, found that the defendants did not know that the newspaper contained the libel; that it was not by negligence that they did not know that there was a libel in the newspaper; and that they did not know that the newspaper was of such a character that it was likely to contain libellous matter, nor ought they to have so known. Judgment having been entered for the defendants upon these findings, the plaintiff appealed, and upon the appeal the M.R. (Lord Esher), after stating that the sale of the newspaper made the defendants prima facie liable, and called upon them to show some circumstances absolving them from liability, continued: "I am not prepared to say that it would be sufficient for them to show that they did not know of the particular libel. But the findings of the jury make it clear that the defendants did not publish the libel. Taking the view of the jury to be right, that the defendants did not know that the paper was likely to contain a libel, and still more, that they ought not to have known this, which must mean that they ought not to have known it, having used reasonable care, the case is reduced to this—that the defendants were innocent disseminators of a thing which they were not bound to know was likely to contain a libel. That being so, I think the defendants are not liable for the libel." Were the circumstances in this case similar? . . . It seems to me that there was ample evidence to satisfy the jury in finding that there was a want of due care in the way in which the defendants carried on their business, by reason of which they failed to discover that the book contained the libel. The result is that the defendants did not obtain from the jury the finding which was necessary to establish the plea which was established in Emmens v. Pottle that the defendants did not publish the libel.—pp. 647, 648.

Lumley v. Gye (1853) 2 El. & Bl. 216; 22 L.J. Q.B. 463; 17 Jur. 827; 1 W.R. 432.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The case of Viears v. Wilcocks, which, though it has been much brought into question, has never been directly overruled, was relied upon as an authority upon this point for the defendant. That case, however, is clearly distinguishable from the present upon the ground suggested by Tindal, L.C.J., in Ward v. Weeks (7 Bing 211; 9 L.J. (o.s.) C.P. 6; 4 M. & P. 796), that the damage in that case, as well as in Viears v. Wilcocks, was not the necessary consequence of the original slander uttered by the defendants, but the result of spontaneous and unauthorised communications made by those to whom the words were uttered by the defendants (p. 237). Two cases, however, were cited for the defendant, as direct authorities against the maintenance of the present action. The first was that of Ashley v. Harrison, in which the plaintiff declared that he had retained Madame Mara to sing publicly for him in certain musical performances which he exhibited for profit at Covent Garden Theatre, but that the defendant, contriving to lessen his profits and to deter Madame Mara from singing, published a libel concerning her which deterred her from singing, as she could not sing without danger of being assaulted and ill-treated in consequence of the libel. Lord Kenyon held at Nisi Prius, that the action was not maintainable, as the injury was too remote. The case does not appear to have undergone much discussion; it was only a decision at Nisi Prius; but it is clearly distinguishable from the present, as Madame Mara was deterred from singing, not directly in consequence of anything done by the defendant, but in consequence of her fear that what he did might induce somebody else to assault and ill-treat her. The injury in that case may have been well held to be too remote; but it does not at all resemble this, where the loss is the direct consequence of the defendant's act.—p. 248.

Lynch v. Knight (1861) 9 H.L. Cas. 577; 8 Jur. (N.S.) 724; 5 L.T. 291.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—From some expressions of Lord Ellenborough in Viears v. Wilcocks, it is argued that such an action will not lie, where the act is wrongful as between the party who does the act and the party to whom it is done. But if there be any error in that case, I think it was in supposing that the offence imputed to the servant, even if he had been guilty of it, would not have justified his master in dismissing him from his service. I do not consider Lord Ellenborough to have held that, although the imputation, if true, would have justified the dismissal, the action would not lie, because the imputation was false, and the dismissal was wrongful.—p. 590.

Riding v. Smith (1876) 1 Ex. D. 91; 45 L.J. Ex. 281; 34 L.T. 500; 24 W.R. 487.

KELLY, C.B.—The cases of Dixon v. Smith and Ward v. Weeks clearly show that an action is not maintainable for slander of a man in his trade without proof of special damage directly arising from the speaking of the words, and not merely from their repetition. I am bound to say that I hope myself that those cases may be brought before the Court of last resort to see if a person is not liable for the natural consequences arising from the repetition of slander uttered by him in the presence of a number of other persons. I cannot doubt that he who is the original author of a slanderous statement is responsible on all principles of justice. But those cases decide that he is not and we are bound by them.—p. 488.

ESHER, M.R.—I think that Brown v. Watkins was rightly decided, though there is a phrase used in the judgments in that case, which, if unexplained, might possibly lead to a misapprehension. I think, however, that the meaning which I should give to that phrase is perfectly consistent with the decision. The judges there use the expression "opposite party." That may be construed to mean that the application must be as against plaintiff and defendant. But in the Chancery Division it may often be necessary to adjust rights in the action between two plaintiffs or two defendants, and I should construe the passages of the judgments in Brown v. Watkins, where it is said that the application must be against an opposite party, as meaning not that it must in all cases be by plaintiffs against defendants or vice versa, but that it must be by and against parties between whom there is some right to be adjusted in the action.—p. 197.

JAMES, L.J.—I do not think that it is necessary for us to examine minutely Hancock v. Guerin. There is a great deal to be said in support of the proposition that it ought not to be a matter of course for a plaintiff to rush in at once with an application for production as soon as his statement of claim has been delivered. The Court ought to have the power of saying that it will refuse production, and I do not say that it was wrong to refuse it in Hancock v. Guerin.—p. 241.

JESSEL, M.R.—Webster v. Whewall has been referred to, but I think only on account of a dictum contained in it. Speaking for myself I do not pay much attention to the dicta of modern judges, as I consider it my duty to decide for myself. This, of course, does not apply to decisions of modern judges, nor to old recognised dicta by eminent judges. In Webster v. Whewall there is nothing but a dictum to help the plaintiff. I think no judge on the bench would have excluded in evidence the deed there in question, though he might not have given the same reasons for admitting it. I have not the least doubt that the judgment arrived at was right, though there are in the judgment one or two dicta which had better have been differently worded.—p. 49.

NORTH, J.—There are, I think, two grounds on which that case [Republic of Costa Rica v. Strousberg] can be distinguished from the present one. There the defendant had no opportunity of making his defence, he had not even appeared. Here I have heard a full statement of what the defendant calls his case. And, secondly, in that case the documents had come properly into the possession of the defendant during his employment as agent for the Republic. His employment had ceased, and then the Republic tried to get the documents back from him, but his possession was originally lawful and proper. In this case it is not even alleged that the documents were ever in the defendant's possession at all, except in the sense that he was a clerk in the office in which they were, and produced them to persons having a right to see them.—p. 58

PEARSON, J.—Higginson v. Hall, in which Malins, V.-C. made an order that the next friend of a lunatic should make an affidavit as to documents; all I have to remark on that case is that counsel for the lunatic consented and almost invited the order, and I cannot help thinking that, if the case had been properly argued the V.-C. would have seen that the order ought not to have been made. The next case was one before Lord O'Hagan, Crowe v. Bank of Ireland. I have . . . the highest respect for the judgment of Lord O'Hagan. I do not know under what circumstances the order in that case was asked for; all I can say is, that if the judgment is correctly reported, I cannot agree with him in thinking that the case of a company is the same as that of an infant. A company is perfectly responsible in every sense. And the reason of making an order that an officer shall make an affidavit, is for the benefit of the company from whom discovery is required. The ordinary course would be that the corporation should make an affidavit, but a corporation cannot make an affidavit. If a corporation did not comply with the order, the proper consequence would be that the goods of the corporation should be sequestered. The corporation then says to the Court, Will you accept the affidavit of an officer? and the officer is put in the place of the corporation, and in that way makes an affidavit for the corporation. That is not the case against an infant; certainly I cannot make an order against the next friend who does not represent the infant, and is not within the terms of the rule.—p. 191.

COTTON, L.J.—The contention of the defendant comes to this, that the judge is to decide whether he did or did not act in violation of his duty before he gives the discovery. It is said that Whyte v. Ahrens is an authority for this proposition. The defendant cannot, however, well rely on my judgment in that case, for, if the judge had a discretion, I think it has been wrongly exercised here. But, no doubt, Fry, L.J. did in that case think that fraud being alleged by the plaintiff, particulars of the fraud ought to have been given before he could be entitled to discovery. Is that the effect of rule 6 of Ord. XIX? There is here a general allegation of fraud, and the plaintiff wants the discovery to enable him to prove his allegation. It may be that he will afterwards have to amend his pleadings, but to say that he must give details of the fraud in the first instance would be to reduce the right of discovery in cases of fraud to very narrow limits indeed. I do not, however, think that that case applies, for there is here a statement of the nature of the fraud alleged.—p. 376.

BOWEN, L.J., who concurred, said: Then arises the question on which Cotton, L.J. and Fry, L.J. are not entirely at one, and I am, therefore, obliged to state my own view. I do not think it necessary to say anything in order to show that the old rule of pleading is a good rule—that, in order to open a settled account, specific errors in the account must be stated. In Bartholomew v. Hanbury (L. R. 2 H. L. 1), Lord Cranworth added to what Lord Westbury said: "I think without wishing to hold parties strictly or technically to the rule, the substance of it, ought always regularly and rigidly to be insisted upon." Without expressing any opinion which of the two learned lords stated the rule more accurately, I think rule 6 of Ord. XIX. is only a rule of pleading, and I believe that this has been so decided by the C. A.—p. 378.

FRY, L.J. doubted.

WOOD, L.J.—If, indeed, as in Noel v. Noel, you can show that the deponent has made on oath a statement which is inconsistent with his affidavit, then his affidavit is proved by himself to be insufficient, and the Court will compel him to make a further affidavit. It is now attempted, by force of Turner, L.J.'s expression of "reasonable suspicion," to carry the rule far beyond anything that was decided in that case. It is urged that a man cannot have land without having title-deeds, but that is not so: his ancestor may have mortgaged the land, so that he may never have had any deeds in his possession. My opinion has always been, that in order to make the principle of Noel v. Noel applicable, it must be shown that the party has made some admission throwing discredit on the sufficiency of his affidavit.—p. 810.

SELYN, L.J.—Even if we were to adopt the expression "reasonable suspicion" used in Noel v. Noel, which I do not think a very happy one, such suspicion must, I think, be one founded on the pleadings and affidavits.—p. 811.

COTTON, L.J. (for self, BRAMWELL and BRETT, L.J.J.).—It [Phelps v. Olive] amounts to this, that the mere statement, "I have seen a bundle of letters," is not sufficient identification. But here we have much more than that. We have the papers numbered 50 to 76 in a bundle marked and initialed. . . . The affidavit there [Fortescue v. Fortescue] was with regard to certain deeds, which it described merely as a bundle of deeds relating to the defendant's title, and the V.-C. held that the affidavit was not sufficient. This is within the principle of our decision. It is true that in ordering a better affidavit the V.-C. says that the plaintiff is entitled to a proper discovery of the instrument which would take away his title, and that he is entitled to know whether that instrument is in the possession of the defendant, and that giving a proper schedule would show that. If the decision was that the plaintiff was entitled to a detailed schedule showing the nature of the defendant's title, we should not agree with it. But that is not the decision.—p. 74. And see post, col. 855.

COTTON, L.J.—As I understand that case, the Court held that there was protection unless the Court was satisfied that the effect of the documents was misconceived. In that case there were court-rolls extending over many years, and the Court was able to see, from the nature of the questions in the action, and of the documents, that the effect of the documents was misunderstood. So far that case is an authority. But I think that we ought not to speculate in order to get rid of the protection claimed, and that we ought to accept the affidavit as conclusive unless the Court can see distinctly that the oath of the party cannot be relied on.—p. 734.

ESHER, M.R., COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ. LORD HERSCHELL.—The first objection taken by Mr. Brown is that the answer is insufficient, inasmuch as it does not contain the further statement that the deeds and documents do not tend to impeach the defendant's own title. He has produced no authority to show that any such statement is necessary. It is true that in Att.-Gen. v. Emerson (supra), Baggallay, L.J. quoted the statement by Knight Bruce, L.J. in Combe v. London Corporation (post, col. 877), of the allegations sufficient to support the claim to protection, amongst which was the allegation that the documents did not contain anything impeaching the defence. But I do not understand it to have been there laid down in terms that it was essential that those words should appear in the answer in addition to such words as are to be found in the present case. In Emmerson v. Dud, Coupe & Co. (supra) the words were similar to those which are used in the present case, and they were held by the C.A. to be sufficient. It appears to me, therefore, that prima facie this affidavit, according to the authorities, is absolutely sufficient. But then Mr. Brown insists that although cross-examination upon such an affidavit is not permissible, there may be cases in which an interrogatory relating to a particular document might be allowed, and he relies upon expressions used in Hall v. Truman, Hanbury & Co. (supra), to show that that is so. I doubt whether he does not seek to attribute too much weight to those expressions of opinion. They seem to me to have been used in the case in question only to guard the learned judges who were then delivering judgment, from being supposed to indicate that there never could be any case or any circumstances in which such a question might be admissible. I do not think they amounted to more than that.—p. 294.

FIELD, J.—If that case [Walburn v. Ingilby] had remained unquestioned, it is possible we might have felt bound to act upon it, but since that case, the matter has been much discussed, and there have been various decisions. In Murray v. Walter, the L.C. said, "It is perfectly true that if documents are in the hands of an agent, the principle of the Court is that the possession of the defendant's agent is the possession of the defendant against whom the order is made. But here the agent is the agent not only for the defendant against whom the order is prayed, but also for other defendants.
The defendant against whom the order is prayed, has not the possession of the documents either personally or through an agent. I have always understood the rule to be that under such circumstances the Court would not make an order for the production." Walburn v. Ingilby, as reported, no doubt seems to infringe on that rule. All I can say is, that I never considered that the practice was altered by that case.

There must have been some peculiarity in that case which does not appear in the report." It would certainly seem, therefore, that in 1839, the L.C. thought that Walburn v. Ingilby had not altered the practice, and that it was inconsistent with the practice to order production of documents in a case like the present. Murray v.
Walters seems to me to decide this question.
As I read the decision, it does not depend on any such ground as the want of parties, but on the principle that the Court will not compel a man to disclose another man's deed. It seems to me that the true ground of the decision is that you cannot in an action against a man who has possession of a deed conjointly with another, that is to say, whose possession, there being a joint title, is in law the possession of himself and another, compel production by him of the deed which belongs to another man as well as himself.
Reid v. Langlois and Edmonds v. Foley are to the same effect. . . . There was no question of possession in that case [Mertons v. Haigh].
The defendant was the sole owner of the documents, but they were in the possession of a clerk of his at New Orleans, and the Court said that the answer was insufficient, for not showing that the defendant had tried to procure the information required. No such question arose there as in this case.—p. 41.

STEPHEN, J.—On the one hand Reid v. Lang- lois and Murray v. Walter seem to be expressly in point. . . . Those most nearly in point are Walburn v. Ingilby and Hutchinson v. Glover.
My brother Field has dealt with the former case, and I agree with what he has said about it. It is sufficient to refer to the observations of the L.C. in Murray v. Walter, with regard to the effect of that decision.—p. 42. [His lordship excellent sense. The principle of them is that production of documents should not be required where the interests of persons not parties to the action might be affected. But here the company is gone; no shred of interest remains. Why should not the Court under those circumstances order inspection of documents when good sense would obviously seem to demand it?—p. 8.

CHELMERSON, L.C.—They [the plaintiffs] say that this protection from answering applies only where a person might expose himself to the peril of a penal proceeding in this country, and not to the case where the liability to penalty or forfeiture is incurred by the breach of the laws of a foreign country. In support of this distinction the plaintiffs rely upon the opinion of Lord Cranworth, when V.-C., in Two Sicilies
(King) v. Willcox. That case has a very close resemblance to the present. . . I quite agree in the general principles stated by Lord Cranworth, and in their application to the particular case before him. There was nothing on the face of the proceedings to inform the mind of the judge whether there was any, and if any, what foreign law applicable to the case, or whether the defendants had incurred any penalty or forfeiture by acting in this country as the agents of the revolutionary government in Sicily. The only ground upon which the defendants objected to produce the documents in their possession was stated in their answer to be, that they believed and had been advised that the production of them would "expose and render them subject to criminal prosecution, punishment and penalties in Sicily." This did not furnish the least information what the foreign law was upon the subject, which it was necessary for the judge to know with certainty before he could say whether the acts done by the persons who objected to answer had rendered them amenable to punishment by that law or not. Upon the particular circumstances of the case [Two Sicilies (King) v. Willcox] I have no doubt that it was most correctly decided. But in giving judgment Lord Cranworth went beyond the particular case, and expressed his opinion that the rule upon which the defendants relied to protect them from answering was one which existed merely by virtue of our own municipal law, and which must have reference exclusively to matters penal by that law. It was unnecessary to lay down so broad a proposition to support the judgment which he pronounced, and he certainly could not have contemplated a case where the presumed ignorance of the judge as to foreign law is completely removed by the admitted statements upon the pleadings, where the exact nature of the penalty or forfeiture incurred by the party objecting to answer is precisely stated, and where the plaintiffs calling for an answer are the sovereign power by whose authority and in whose name the proceedings for the forfeiture are instituted and who have the property to be forfeited within their reach. What would have been Lord Cranworth's opinion upon such a state of circumstances, it is impossible for me to conjecture; but it is so different from what was before his mind in Two Sicilies (King) v. Willcox that I cannot feel that there is any judgment of his which ought to influence my decision upon the present occasion. . . It is a case entirely distinguishable from Two Sicilies (King) v. Willcox. There it was not shown that the defendants had not rendered themselves liable to criminal prosecution. Here the particular ground of liability to forfeiture is expressly alleged and proved, and proceedings have actually been taken and are pending to enforce it. There it was doubtful whether the defendants would ever be within the reach of a prosecution, and their being so depended on their voluntary return to their own country. Here the subject of the forfeiture is within the power of the United States, and the proceedings against the defendant will be equally effectual, whether he remains here or returns to the country where his property is situate.—p. 131.

PEARSON, J.—But, as I understand the rule laid down by the C. A. in Brown v. Sewell, where there is an inspection of documents in the office of the solicitor to whose client they belong, no costs can be allowed on either side. The M.R. certainly says so, and I think that Mr.
Henderson is right in saying that his statement applies to the costs of both sides. I have been referred, on the other hand, to an order and a schedule which appear at first sight to be inconsistent with this rule, but I think that on a narrower examination they appear to refer only to the costs which ought to be charged as between solicitor and client, and not to refer to those which will be allowed as between party and party.—p. 967.

ROMILLY, M.R.—I am disposed also to think that it was not intended by Lord Cottenham [in Adams v. Fisher] to carry his decision to the extent it has been considered to cover. According to the principles supposed to be established by it, if an executor should dispute the right of legatee or the debt of a creditor suing on behalf of himself and others, he might reset setting forth the accounts of his testator, which is a proposition at variance with the uniform and settled practice and decisions of the Court; but I am disposed to believe that the decision of Adams v. Fisher was intended by the L.C. to be limited to withholding only the production of the documents which could not assist the plaintiff in making out his title to the relief sought; at least the observations made by his lordship respecting the admission of counsel to the question put by the Court seemed to point to this result.
However this may be, the authorities which relate to the subject were not commented on nor brought to the attention of the Court; and after the most careful consideration which I am able to give to this subject, I am of opinion that if Adams v. Fisher goes beyond the point I have last suggested, it is not in accordance with the long line of authorities before decided in this Court; and therefore, if I have to choose between that case and other cases decided by equally high authority, I feel myself compelled to follow those which are alone, in my opinion, consistent with the principle on which pleadings in equity can be safely and clearly established.—p. 336.

ELDON, L.C.—In Bettison v. Farrington, to a

had been suffered which barred the plaintiff's right, and the answer referred to a lease and release making a tenant to the precipe, and leading the uses of the recovery; on motion, Lord Talbot ordered the production of the deed, merely on the ground of that reference in the answer, assuming as his reason, that as it must be produced at the hearing, it ought to be produced on motion. Subsequent cases appear to question that doctrine on both its points.—p. 121.

ESHER, M. R.—There is a clear distinction between this case and that of Swansea Corporation v. Quirk, for in that case the corporation had the option of answering by their town clerk, or other proper officer, and chose to answer by their town clerk; here the plaintiffs were compelled to answer by their town clerk, and by no one else.—p. 691. Harbord v. Monk (1878) 9 Ch. D. 616; 38 L. T. 411; 27 W. R. 164.

JESSEL, M. R.—Mercier v. Cotton is obviously limited to actions in the nature of common law actions. It has no application to actions in the Chancery Division. In a common law action, if a plaintiff exhibits interrogatories at the time of delivering his statement of claim, under Ord. XXXI., rule 1, he must justify them, if required, under rule 5 (1883, rule 7); but in an ordinary action in the Chancery Division the interrogatories justify themselves.—p. 617.

CHITTY, J.—The argument for the defendants was founded chiefly on the judgment of Kay, L. J. in Zierenberg v. Labouchere, and was to the effect that, unless there was some fiduciary relation between the parties, the rule was that particulars should precede discovery. I am unable to deduce any such proposition from the judgment of Kay, L. J. He did explain that the right to discovery in the case before him differed from that against a person standing in a fiduciary position, and he put the distinction on the ground not only of the trustee or agent necessarily having knowledge of any funds, but also because the cestui que trust or principal was entitled to the knowledge in the possession of his trustee or agent. He did not lay down any such proposition as is contended for by the defendants, and, in my opinion, there was no such rule that particulars, except where there is fiduciary relationship, should precede discovery.—p. 141.

DENMAN, J.—It is perfectly clear that in Aste v. Sumner the C. A. did not agree with the decision of the Divisional Court that there was no discretion in any case to dispense with the deposit, although it was unnecessary for the purposes of that case for the C. A. to decide the point. We find, therefore, two judges in the C. A. expressing their dissent from a decision of a Divisional Court, although not in terms overruling it, and under those circumstances I think this Court is left at large to give its own interpretation to these rules.—p. 455. STIRLING, J.—That action [Eder & Co. v. Attenborough] was brought against many defendants for several causes of action; but the defendants appeared jointly and delivered a joint defence, and it was held that the decision in Smith v. Reed ought not to be applied, and it was ordered that 5l only should be paid into Court before the delivery of interrogatories. Now, did the two learned judges intend to overrule the decision in Smith v. Reed? I think that they did not. They distinguished that case. Pollock, B., in giving judgment, said: "This is not a case of different defendants defending by separate solicitors, and each having independent rights;" and Field, J. said: "The defendants rely on my decision in the case in which I held that payment of 5l was not enough. But in that case the party had delivered separate and distinct sets of interrogatories, one set to A., one to B., and so on, and I thought, and still think, that I was right in holding that a deposit in respect of each set was necessary." . . . Whether the decision in Eder & Co. v. Attenborough was quite consistent with that in Smith v. Reed I need not discuss; as I have said, I think I ought to follow that in Smith v. Reed, unless it has been overruled.—p. 371.

Part of his evidence to establish that right would be to show that the right had been actually enjoyed, and the defendant asked to be allowed to interrogate as to specific instances in which that right had been exercised or enjoyed. Lord Romilly decided that that could not be done for this obvious reason—the acts themselves were not at issue, but were only evidence bearing on the issues which were raised between the parties. But in this case, when the defendant has pleaded in most general terms acts of misconduct, he might set up any particular act of misconduct as one of the issues in the action. If that be so, the plaintiff is entitled to know what that specific issue is.—p. 448. And see cols. 866, 867.

COTTON, L.J.—Reliance was placed on the observations of Baggallay, L.J., in Saunders v. Jones (supra), but that was merely a doubt, not a decision, and if it is necessary for the C. A. to lay that ghost, I may say that there is no foundation for the opinion that a person who has a ground for refusing to answer is precluded from availing himself of that ground because he has not applied to have the interrogatory struck out, his right to decline answering being expressly reserved to him by the 8th rule. Then it is said there is an authority in favour of the order of the V.-C. In my opinion, Atherley v. Harvey is no authority in its favour, and even if it were, if we thought it was wrong it would be the duty of this Court, not being bound by that decision (although perhaps the V.-C. would be), to lay down the correct principle. When, however, we come to look at Atherley v. Harvey, it appears that the judges thought they were following the rule in equity in ordering the interrogatories to be struck out. In my opinion, they erroneously applied a rule which did exist in equity, namely, that a bill of discovery in aid of an action for tort was demurrable. That rule has no application where an action is properly brought in a Court which has power to enforce discovery by means of interrogatories.—p. 654.

ESHER, M.R.—I cannot help thinking that in McIlroy v. Duncane, Field, J. must have been applying the new rule on the subject on the supposition that it was identical in effect with the former rule. If he really had in view the terms of the existing rule, then I cannot agree with his decision. . . . In the case cited [Sammons v. Bailey], GRANTHAM, J. seems to have thought that the judge must strike out all [the interrogatories] or none. In that I cannot agree with him. . . . Allhusen v. Labouchere seems to me to take the very distinctions which I have taken. It was held there, no doubt, that a party who objects to some of a set of interrogatories, on the ground that they are objectionable, must state to which of them he objects; but there is nothing to show that the judge may not look at the interrogatories as a whole—pp. 10–12.

ESHER, M.R.—That case [Allhusen v. Labouchere], therefore, is a distinct authority that objection to one of the parties putting a question by way of discovery to his opponent must be taken on oath. If the party to whom the question is put is prepared to say that his answer might tend to criminate him, he is entitled to do so and to object to answer, but the time for him to take the objection is in his answer. But it is said that the decision in Allhusen v. Labouchere is overruled by Redfern v. Redfern. That case was decided in reference to the special practice of the Divorce Court and upon the Divorce Acts. It is not a decision upon the general law of discovery, and Allhusen v. Labouchere was not referred to either in the arguments or in the judgments. Allhusen v. Labouchere is untouched by Redfern v. Redfern—p. 599.

ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion Parnell v. Walter, which, if rightly decided, is an authority that, in the case of an action for libel against the proprietors of The Times or any of the great London or country newspapers, such an interrogatory [as to the number of copies in circulation] is a proper one, was wrongly decided. I agree with the view expressed by Mathew, J., and substantially by Coleridge, C.J. in the subsequent case of Rumney v. Walter, that the interrogatories administered in Parnell v. Walter were frivolous and vexatious, and that no further answer to them should have been required.—p. 150.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion, the decision in Parnell v. Walter was wrong. . . . So far as the current of authority subsequent to *Parnell v. JESSEL, M.R.—Before parting with this case, I should like to say a word or two upon the decision in Saunders v. Jones, in the Appeal Court, as I was not a party to that decision, although I have acted upon it very often. As I understand that decision, the main portion of it applied to the four first interrogatories, and it amounts simply to this. Whereas at common law, in an action for wrongful dismissal, if the defendant pleaded that he dismissed the plaintiff for misconduct, the plaintiff would have a right to the particulars of the misconduct, so that he might be able to show at the trial that there was no misconduct, and could obtain that under a summons for better particulars; but there being a practice coming to the Chancery Division from the old Court of Chancery, not as a rule to give better particulars, although of course it could be done, but to allow the particulars to be obtained by interrogatories, especially when you have to interrogate for other purposes, there was no reason, then, for departing from the practice, it being a cheaper course of procedure and better; and therefore where there was among the interrogatories one or more simply asking for better particulars, those interrogatories should be allowed without putting the applicant to the trouble of taking out a summons for better particulars. That is all that was decided, and it is as plain as possible, because when you look at the observations of the late lamented Thesiger, L.J. (p. 447), and of James, L.J. on the same page, they are directed to the point that the plaintiff is to have the particulars of the alleged misconduct; and when you look at the judgment of James, L.J. (p. 449), he says: "He is entitled to particulars like the particulars of breaches or infringement, and it is no sufficient answer to say, 'You have not taken the right course, you ought to have applied to the V.-C. for particulars, which is not according to the practice of the Chancery Division. The only mode in which those particulars could have been got in Chancery was by administering interrogatories, and I am of opinion that a party may still adopt that course'—not 'must' but 'may'—and that the interrogatories must be answered." If he is interrogated for other purposes, an interrogatory may be added for this purpose, and that is all that is decided on the point.—p. 97.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The extent to which such power of interrogating goes is to be found in Eade v. Jacobs, which shows that a party is not to be compelled by means of interrogatories to give discovery of the evidence which he is going to adduce at the trial. So understood the case is a guide as to the extent to which the interrogatories as to the conversation are to be answered.—p. 874.

Bidler v. Bridges (1885) 29 Ch. D. 29; 54 L. J. Ch. 798; 52 L. T. 455; 33 W. R. 792.

KAY, J.—As to Lowndes v. Davies, I will only say this, that it is a case which is discussed in Wigram, V.-C.'s book (p. 289), where he points out that it stands really alone, and is not consistent with the previous authorities he refers to; and elsewhere in the book he refers to the fact that Shadwell, V.-C. had shown in many cases a determination as far as he could to assist discovery in almost every case. But he also refers to another case which came before the same learned judge when he was a lord commissioner, namely, Hardman v. Ellames (col. 857), in which the decision seems to have been not entirely consistent with that in Lowndes v. Davies. However, he disputes the authority of Lowndes v. Davies, and I cannot find any case in which that has been followed unless it be Hoffmann v. Postill. That is a case which to my mind, as far as the decision goes, is very clear and simple. There the bill had been filed by the owners of a patent against the defendant for infringement, and the defendant, having answered the bill, filed a concise statement and interrogatories for the examination of the plaintiff. In his answer he had set up that the patent was void for want of novelty. Everybody familiar with patent cases knows that that is an issue the affirmative of which is on the defendant. He has a perfect right to interrogate as to the want of novelty to any extent he likes, because that is his case, and not the plaintiff's case, and accordingly Selwyn, L.J. and Giffard, L.J. thought that interrogatories which went to that part of the case ought to be answered. And Giffard, L.J. is reported to have said: "As regards Duro v. Elley (post, col. 871), it must be always remembered that that was the case of a plaintiff exhibiting interrogatories to a defendant, and it was there held that the plaintiff could not call on the defendant to set forth the particulars of his defence. But when you come to the case of a defendant asking questions of a plaintiff, it is a very different thing. It is the defendant's business to destroy the plaintiff's case, and there the defendant has a right to ask all questions which are fairly calculated to show that the patent is not a good patent, or that what he alleges to be an infringement, is not an infringement." As to the first branch of that proposition, there could not be, for the reason I have given, the least doubt. It was not the plaintiff's case but the defendant's case that the patent is void for want of novelty. The defendant had a perfect right to search the conscience of the plaintiff, and to make that out if he could from the admissions of the plaintiff. But if this is to be understood as stating a general proposition that in every case whatever a defendant who does not set up any substantial case of his own, but merely meets the case of the plaintiff by a traverse, is entitled, to use these words, to destroy the plaintiff's case, and to ask all the questions he possibly can to effect that purpose, that is simply a contradiction of the well-settled rule that the questions which either plaintiff or defendant can ask must be confined to those which establish his own substantive case, and do not embrace questions relating to the evidence by which or the manner in which his adversary means to establish his case. I am quite satisfied that so great a judge as Giffard, L.J. never intended in those words, which seems to have been cited in subsequent cases (for instance, in Seivers Commissioners v. Glasse, supra, col. 863), to lay down the proposition that a defendant has a larger right of discovery than a plaintiff. I feel satisfied that he was only dealing with the case before him. . . . The plaintiffs [Att.-Gen. v. Gaskill] were seeking to search the conscience of the defendant, not as to the defendant's case but as to their own case. They said there was a right of way, and they were interrogating the defendant to try and obtain from him admissions that such was the case. . . . And Cotton, L.J., with reference to his own judgment in Bade v. Jacobs, says, "I think it has been somewhat misunderstood. In that case the defence had set up a parol agreement which was said to be material, and what I held was this, that the interrogatories ought to some extent to be limited so as to ask the defendant to give discovery of the substance only of the conversation on which he relied as a defence, and that the person interrogated was not bound to set forth the names of the witnesses or the details of the conversations. That was expressed in this passage of the judgment, 'I think that the plaintiff is entitled to a discovery of the facts upon which the defendant relies to establish his case, but not of the evidence which it is proposed to adduce,' and the rest of the judgment, modifying in some slight way the interrogatory, has reference to what was laid down as the principle of the decision." I think that what the learned judge decided was only this. The defendant has not pleaded these conversations as strictly as according to practice in Chancery he ought to have done, and therefore he is bound to answer this interrogatory to the extent to which it seeks that statement from you which ought to be contained in your pleadings—pp. 40—42.

BOVILL, C.J.—The ground upon which the decision in the case referred to proceeded was, that the defendant laid no ground for the discovery he sought. Here, however, the defendants admit that the plaintiffs have a prima facie case under a bill of lading properly indorsed, and a prima facie liability by their negligent delivery of the barley to Stephenson without receiving the bill of lading. They seek to invalidate the plaintiffs' claim by showing that a fraud has been practised upon them, and showing some connivance or complicity of the plaintiffs with the persons who committed the fraud. They are seeking the means of proving their own case, not to inquire into that of the plaintiffs.—p. 110

QUAIN, J.—Flitcroft v. Fletcher has been very much doubted; and, if law at all, only applies to such a state of facts as is referred to in Stoate v. Rew by ERLE, C.J., who says: "If a man has been long in possession of an estate, and a stranger comes to dispossess him, the defendant may call for some general information as to the nature of the title which is to be made against him." That is the only principle upon which Flitcroft v. Fletcher can be supported.—p. 243.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Reference was also made to a case at law of Horton v. Bott, in which a discovery of matters relevant only to the defendant's title was, very properly, refused. It does not, however, appear to me to follow from these principles, or from Horton v. Bott, that a plaintiff in an action of ejectment, suing upon a legal title, ought to be denied that discovery of matters within the defendant's knowledge, and tending to support, not the defendant's but the plaintiff's case, to which a plaintiff at law would be entitled in any other kind of action. In the argument before your lordships the appellant's counsel produced a series of authorities which, if they had been cited in the C. A., might, not improbably, have satisfied that Court (as I believe they have satisfied all your lordships) that bills of discovery in aid of the title of plaintiffs at law in actions of ejectment were neither unknown to the Court of Chancery nor excluded by any rule or practice of that Court; on the contrary, that they were dealt with in the same manner and on the same principles as similar bills in other cases.—p. 390. ESHER, M.R.—The only sensible interpretation of the statute [Patents, &c. Act, 1883] is that the two sections (secs. 58 and 59) apply to two distinct remedies, the one by way of penalty, the other by way of damages. It is said, however, that we ought to hold otherwise; because Lush, L.J., in Robinson v. Curry [7 Q. B. D. 465. See "LIMITATIONS, STATUTES OF,"], quoted Merrick v. Hundred of Ossulston, and said that in that case it was stated, "the Court held that where an Act of Parliament only gives a remedy to the party grieved, that is not to be considered a penal action." Put in that way it would seem that that was the holding of the Court in that case; but that is not so, for it is a statement of what was said by Lee, C.J., in giving judgment, as to the decision reported in Strange [Smith v. Phillips, Stra. 136]. I cannot think that it is a sufficient authority, especially since, as my brother Bowen points out, it has never been accepted as law. Mr. James relied principally upon Adams v. Batley, decided on 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 2. The statute is wholly different from the one we are considering, and we arrived at a conclusion that the action in that case was not to recover a penalty, but for damages. That conclusion was arrived at by looking at the context, which, though the word "offender" was used, took away from it its prima facie meaning and left the action one for damages.—p. 323.

ESHER, M.R.—But with regard to actions for penalties it was expressly laid down in Martin v. Treacher by each member of the Court that there is a rule of law which prevents the application of any of the procedure of the Court with regard to discovery to an action for a penalty by a common informer. That decision is not based upon any equitable doctrine of the Courts of equity, but upon the ground that the Courts, whether of law or equity, will not assist the plaintiff in an action for a penalty. The decision applies both to discovery by affidavit of documents and to discovery by the administration of interrogatories; and the principle asserted was that the whole law of discovery including both these things, was inapplicable to a defendant in an action for a penalty. Now I come to actions brought to insist upon a forfeiture of land. . . . That [Pye v. Butterfield] was an action to recover possession of a house held on lease on the ground of forfeiture, and there the Court discharged a rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to deliver to the defendant interrogatories in writing, and why the defendant should not answer them. It has been contended that the case turned upon the particular interrogatories delivered, but each of the judges who decided the case affirmed the contrary. No doubt in the reports of the case the interrogatories are set out, but the Court ignored them. The decision was not that those particular interrogatories would not be allowed, but that no interrogatories would be allowed. . . . Unhappily there is Seaward v. Dennington. That was an appeal from an order of a judge at chambers ordering the defendant to make the common form affidavit of documents. The action was brought by a lessor against a lessee to recover possession of the demised premises on a forfeiture for breach of covenant. There A. L. Smith, L.J., says: "I agree that it has been the practice ever since the time of Lord Hardwicke that in an action for penalties the Court will not assist the plaintiff by ordering the defendant to make discovery. This case, however, is not an action for a penalty, but is an action to recover possession of demised premises after a breach of covenant, and though the defendant is not bound to disclose to the plaintiff circumstances which will enable the plaintiff to make out a case of forfeiture, nevertheless the defendant is bound to make an affidavit of documents. But when he does so he can do so by covering particular documents."

. . . After hearing the arguments in this case and examining the law, I am bound to say that I think that that part of the judgment is wrong, and I believe that A. L. Smith, L.J. will agree with me. We must therefore act on our present view, and decide that that case is not correct. . . . That [Ind. Coope & Co. v. Emmerson] was an action for the forfeiture of land, and the decision was that the defendant could not escape production of documents by setting up the defence of purchase for valuable consideration without notice. I do not think that the H. L. meant to say that the two rules of procedure I have mentioned were done away with by the Judicature Act, 1873. I hold therefore that that decision did not do away with the rule for the protection of defendants against common informers, and there is a long series of authorities that actions for forfeiture stand upon the same footing as actions for penalties.—p. 640.

SELBORNE, L.C.—In Bolton v. Liverpool Corporation, Lord Cottenham, affirming a decision of the V.C., refused production of documents upon a statement much less complete than that in this case. The very argument which we have heard here to-day was urged, and is thus dealt with by Lord Cottenham.—“The plaintiff here does not claim anything positively or affirmatively under the documents in question. He only defends himself against the claims of the corporation, and suggests that the documents evidencing their title may aid his defence. How? By proving his title, he says. But how can those documents prove his title? Only by disclosing some defect in that of the corporation. The description of the documents is, that they rebut or negative the plaintiff's title; they are the corporation's title, and not his, and they are only his negatively, by failing to prove that of the corporation. He rests on the right which he has, in common with all mankind, to be exempt from dues and customs; and he says, ‘Prove me liable, if you can.’ The corporation have certain documents which they say prove his liability. He cannot call for these documents, merely because they may, upon inspection, be found not to prove his liability, and so to help him and hurt his adversary, whose title they are.” The position of the parties was there reversed, and some of Lord Cottenham's expressions relate to that fact, but I apprehend that the principle is the same. However, I should be very sorry to be understood to mean that it would be safe for any one to content himself with saying what was said there, which was simply that the documents related to his own title. There can be no doubt that, according to the present practice of the Court, a party is expected to go further, and at least to say negatively that the documents do not prove or tend to prove the title of his adversary . . . Bolton v. Liverpool Corporation and Hughes v. Biddulph were supposed to have laid down a narrower rule, namely, that the communications must have been in anticipation of the particular litigation. But I cannot see that anything was there said tending to the establishment of the narrower rule, though reference was made to some earlier cases, supposed to be authorities for the doctrine that cases laid before counsel for their opinions must be produced, though the opinions might not be.

... Then followed Walsingham (Lord) v. Goodrich, and it is evident that the very learned and accurate judge, Sir J. Wigram, who decided it, felt himself embarrassed by the conflicting state of dicta and perhaps authority, which he found in existence, and, yielding to what he thought was the preponderance of authority, he limited the protection much more than he would have done if he had proceeded on what was his view of the sound principle. That case, therefore, without any disrespect to the learned judge who decided it, may well be regarded as one that will not bind, unless subsequent authorities are found equally to have failed to emancipate the Court from the supposed fetters of earlier dicta, or earlier cases. But in Pearse v. Pearce a great stride was made towards the emancipation of the Court from any limits inconsistent with the just extension and application of the principle. Knight Bruce, V.-C., in one of the ablest judgments of one of the ablest judges who ever sat in this Court, examined Ridcliffe v. Furman (supra, col. 877), and said that the notion that the H. L. had established any such principle of limitation was really ill-founded: and what is more important, he practically overruled the distinction by what he did in that case. It is said that in Janney v. Dix (col. 878), Wood, V.-C. did not go the whole length of Pearse v. Pearce. I confess I do not see any ground for supposing that he differed from anything that was said in Pearse v. Pearce. But there is a later authority by that most accurate and learned judge, Sir R. Kindersley—Laurence v. Campbell—which contains a statement of the V.-C.'s view of the principle and also of the rule which in 1859 had come to be well settled and established in this Court on the foundation of that principle. He says: "It is not now necessary, as it formerly was, for the purpose of obtaining production, that the communications should be made either during or relating to an actual or even to an expected litigation. It is sufficient if they pass as professional communications in a professional capacity." I can only say that I entirely agree with the views both of the principle and of its proper extension taken in these later authorities.—pp. 365—367. BOVILL, C.J.—Rebance is placed, on the part of the plaintiffs, on Baker v. L. & S. W. Ry., where production of reports of a similar description was ordered. It is to be observed, however, that the point now made on behalf of the defendants was not raised there. The resistance to the production of the reports was not rested on the ground of impending litigation, but on the ground that "they were confidential communications made to the defendants by their agents or their servants in the course of their duty." A ground which this Court, in Woolley v. North London Ry., held to be untenable. Independently of that, the case was one of a peculiar character. The injured person had settled his claim with the company, and afterwards died, in consequence, as was said, of the shock he had sustained, and the action was brought by his executors. The Court considered that the ground of privilege failed, and it is difficult to see what other course they could have adopted. Furthermore, we are informed by counsel that the accord and satisfaction there set up was resisted on the ground of fraud. If that be so, it makes the decision consistent with the other cases; because, fraud being alleged in the settlement with the deceased, the reports might be material to show what knowledge the company or their representatives had of the matters in question. I observe, too, that Cockburn, C.J., in his judgment, expressly states that he adheres to the decision in Chartered Bank of India, &c. v. Rich. Therefore, as the principle clearly laid down in that case confines the right to communications which are privileged on the ground that they have reference to impending or actual litigation, I think Baker v. L. & S. W. Ry. is distinguishable from the present case. There is nothing here to suggest that the reports in question were made otherwise than with a view to anticipated litigation.—p. 151.

BRETT, J.—I think the plaintiffs ought not to be called upon to produce them [certain documents], because they were questions asked and answers given with a view of an anticipated litigation, and for the purpose of enabling the plaintiffs to guide themselves as to the mode of carrying on that litigation successfully. It seems to me that that is the rule which after a consideration of almost all the cases was so laid down by this Court in Cossey v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. and which was adopted by the Court of Ex. in Skinner v. G. N. Ry. and which seems also to be the rule which had been laid down in the Court of Ch. in Rosa v. Gibbs (supra, col. 880). It is said that Fenner v. L. & S. E. Ry. in the Court of Q. B. is at variance with those cases. Now, I should be very sorry if I thought that it was so, but considering the point which was taken in the argument of that case, and the mode in which that case was dealt with, I do not think that it is at all at variance with Cossey v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. and Skinner v. G. N. Ry. The point which seems to me to be really decided in Fenner v. L. & S. E. Ry., is that which was expressed by Blackburn, J., who, in the course of his judgment, says: "I thought that the documents specified in the schedule were obviously relevant to the question in dispute, and therefore fell within the general rule, and that the only question was whether they fell within any exception." Now he states what he was forced to decide in that case: "Mr. Willis contended broadly that as they were answers to questions put by the defendants after litigation was impending, they were necessarily privileged, and if I had thought that there was any such general rule I should have refused to make the order." . . . Blackburn, J. goes on to say, "It occurred to me that there might be a distinction between the earlier documents and the later ones; for I thought it almost certain from the materials before me that the first letter from the manager in town to the local officer would be something to this effect: 'We have a complaint as to the delay in delivering cattle at your station, report to us the circumstances'; and I thought the report sent in answer to such an inquiry would not be privileged. But I thought it almost possible that some of the later letters might be something to this effect. 'It seems probable that if we resist this claim much will depend on the evidence of some particular person as to some particular fact; please to learn from him what his evidence will be, and communicate to us the result.'" There he puts a case of anticipated litigation, and of the question asked in order to guide the party whether he will resist it or not, and then he says, "And if such had been the fact, I should, in the exercise of the discretion which I think is vested in a judge, have refrained from ordering the inspection of the answer to that letter without determining whether I had power to order it or not." That seems to me to be no departure from the rule laid down in Cossey v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. Moreover, in Malden v. G. N. Ry. (supra), Blackburn, J. says: "If it appears that there is a letter from the attorney in a cause to a man who may very probably be called as a witness at the trial, that letter being written after the litigation had commenced (which is the case with all these letters), it is not prima facie a privileged communication, unless you show some reason to the contrary." Quain, J. says "confidential communications are not necessarily privileged, but if they are made not only as confidential communications but with a view to or in contemplation of a litigation, they are privileged." That is the doctrine of Cossey v. L. B. & S. C. Ry., and therefore, although Blackburn, J. afterwards, in his judgment in Malden v. G. N. Ry. says: "We adhere to the principles laid down in Fenner v. L. & S. E. Ry.," all I can say is, so also do I adhere to those principles, for as I understand Fenner v. L. & S. E. Ry. those principles do not differ from those established by Cossey v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. and Skinner v. G. N. Ry.—p. 351.

JAMES, L.J.—The old rule was that every document in the possession of a party must be produced if it was material or relevant to the cause, unless it was covered by some established privilege. It was established that communications that had passed directly or indirectly between a man and his solicitor were privileged, and the privilege extended no further. It is now contended that that rule was entirely altered by an expression of Stuart, V.-C. in Rosa v. Gibbs. I am quite sure that the V.-C. did not intend, by a mere casual and hasty generalisation not called for at all by the facts of the case, to depart from the whole tradition and course of this Court with respect to the production of documents. If the rule had been as was supposed to be laid down in that case, all that is said in text books by learned authors with regard to the origin of the principle, and with regard to the justification of the privilege—all that is said about its being confined to lawyers and not extending to doctors and priests—all that has been said by learned judges in Chancery, in the particular circumstances of the cases that came before them, to show how they might be brought within that general principle—the whole of that would be, to my mind, puerile nonsense if there had been that law which is supposed to have been laid down, that any communication made by a person with a view to litigation, who ever the person is, must be protected. As to the cases at law, it is not necessary to go through them, as they seem to have been brought, apparently, now at least, very much into conformity with the cases in equity, and it is needless to go through them for the purpose of seeing whether in each of them, if the same state of circumstances came before the Court, the same decision would be arrived at. Looking at the dicta and the judgments cited, they might require to be fully considered, but I think they may possibly all be based upon this, which is an intelligible principle, that as you have no right to see your adversary's brief, you have no right to see that which comes into existence merely as the materials for the brief. But that seems to me to have no application whatever to a communication between a principal and his agent in the matter of the agency, giving information of the facts and circumstances of the very transaction which is the subject-matter of the litigation. Such a communication is, above all others, the very thing which ought to be produced.—p. 656.

BRETT, L.J.—The proposition had before us for approval is, that where one of the parties to an action has in his possession or control documents which passed between his solicitor and third parties, they are protected in his hands from inspection, on the ground that they were documents which passed between the solicitor and the third party for the purpose of enabling the solicitor to give legal advice to his client, although such information was obtained by the solicitor for that purpose at a time when there was no litigation pending between the parties, nor any litigation contemplated. It seems to me that that proposition cannot be acceded to. It is beyond any rule which has ever been laid down by the Court, and it seems to me that it is beyond the principles of the rules which have been laid down. The rule as to the non-production of communications between solicitor and client, is a rule which has been established upon grounds of general or public policy. It is confined entirely to communications which take place for the purpose of obtaining legal advice from professional persons. It is confined in terms, it seems to me it is so confined in principle, and it does not extend to the suggested case. It was said, however, that there were two cases which supported, although they were not absolute decisions in favour of the proposition. One was Mostyn v. West Mostyn Coal and Iron Co. (supra, col. 882), which, when looked at, gives no support at all to the present contention. The other case was Wilson v. Northampton and Banbury Junction Ry. I think that probably some documents were shut out from production in that case which were of such a character that, if the decision really intended to shut them out, it might give colour to the proposition contended for. But if that is so, then, with deference, I think that decision was wrong. There is no authority, and there is no principle which obliges us to extend the doctrine to the extent now contended for.—p. 683.

BRETT, M.R.—The judgment of Cockburn, C.J. in Bullock v. Corry, lays down a most valuable principle on this subject. There the documents in question were being inquired about in a different action from that in relation to which they originally came into existence, and the L.C.J. said, "The privilege which attaches by the invariable practice of our Courts to communications between solicitor and client ought to be carefully preserved. In my opinion the rule is, once privileged always privileged. This will apply a fortiori where the succeeding action is substantially the same as that in which the documents were used." This is a clear intimation of opinion that, if a document is once so privileged, the fact that it is another action in which it is being inquired about will not destroy the privilege. It seems to me that the expressions used by Lord Lyndhurst, in Holmes v. Baddeley (supra, col. 877) really imply that he was of the same opinion. On principle I agree with the opinion so expressed.—p. 119.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The expressions used in Wheeler v. Le Marchant appear to me to indicate very correctly the limits of the professional privilege with regard to communications passing between solicitor and client.—p. 120.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I take it that, as a general rule, one may say that a document once privileged is always privileged. I do not mean to say that privilege cannot be waived, but the mere fact that documents are held, and have not been destroyed, does not amount to a waiver of the privilege. I think, therefore, that, speaking generally, the case comes within Minet v. Morgan. It was said that Wheeler v. Le Marchant is contrary to this view. I do not think so. It seems to me that that case has been a little misunderstood. I think that the decision there was perfectly right. An attempt was made to extend the doctrine of privilege to documents which were not covered by it upon any proper understanding of the doctrine. I think that will be seen from Cotton, L.J.'s judgment in that case and the form of order that he suggested. No doubt Wheeler v. Le Marchant has given rise to a little controversy, and Cotton, L.J., has referred to it in Kennedy v. Lyell (supra, col. 884), where he says, what is plain enough when the case is studied, "All that was decided was that communications between the solicitors and the survivor of the client before any litigation was contemplated, were not protected." The case was again referred to in Lowden v. Blakey (supra, col. 884), before Denman and Charles, J.J., and it was again pointed out that there was nothing in Wheeler v. Le Marchant inconsistent with the decision in Minet v. Morgan, nor is there. The case was again very carefully examined into by Stirling, J., in Leahey v. Halifax Joint Stock Banking Co, explained and he came to the conclusion, which is inevitable to any one who studies the two cases, that Wheeler v. Le Marchant was right and that Minet v. Morgan was right too. That is to say, they do not conflict. Therefore, so far, Minet v. Morgan may be prayed in aid as protecting these privileged documents.—p. 506. RIGBY and V. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—That case [Bustros v. White] was decided, not upon the rule now in question, but upon Ord. XXXI. r. 11 of the old rules, which corresponds to Ord. XXVI. r. 14 of present rules. But since that decision additions have been made to rr. 12 and 18 of Ord. XXXI. for the express purpose of making it not compulsory on the Court to order discovery or inspection if the Court does not think it necessary. Therefore, as the matter now stands, I am of opinion that it is not obligatory to order inspection.—p. 192.

NORTH, J.—I do not think the learned judges [in Norden v. Defries] intended to depart from the view taken by the V.-C. in the previous case; and neither the arguments nor the judgment deal with the real question, whether a record of what is taken in open Court can be privileged at all: and there is nothing in that case which ought to prevent me from following the earlier case of Nicholl v. Jones and the late case of Rawstone v. Preston Corporation.—p. 372. And see post.

STIRLING, J.—It must be taken that the accounts were in the first instance privileged, for they were prepared at the instance of the plaintiffs' professional advisers with a view to a former litigation, after that litigation had commenced. That alone would be sufficient to confer privilege, even if they had not been prepared also with a view to the present litigation. On this, Walsham v. Stanton (supra, col. 884) is a direct authority. It has also been held that, as a general rule, a document once privileged is always privileged.—Bullock v. Corry (supra, col. 884). Pearce v. Foster (supra, col. 884), and the very recent case of Culcroft v. Gued (supra, col. 885) . . . These decisions appear to be based on the necessity of allowing full and free communication for the purposes of litigation not only between a solicitor and his client, but between the solicitor and persons whose assistance he requires or with whom he communicates in order to enable him properly to conduct the litigation. But there is another line of decisions under which it is sought to bring the present case. It has been decided that notes of proceedings in open Court—Nicholl v. Jones and Worswick, In re, Robson v. Worswick—or before an arbitration—Rawstone v. Preston Corporation—are as a rule not privileged, but must be produced. These decisions proceed on the ground, as I understand them, that the administration of justice in this country is a matter of public interest and to be conducted (again as a general rule) in public, and consequently that there can be nothing privileged or confidential which passes in open Court. . . . The depositions have been filed in the usual way. They seem to me to have become publici juris within the meaning of the decisions in Nicholl v. Jones and the cases which followed it, and to be liable to production accordingly. Some reliance was placed on The Palermo, but there the depositions of which copies were sought were not publici juris.—p. 26.

HALSBRURY, L.C.—In the parallel, but not exactly similar, case in the P. C. where the word "oath" was used, the P. C. held (I myself was a party to that judgment) that it must be understood that where it was intended to be an allegation that a fraud had been committed you must allege it and prove it, and that it was no fraud for a man to make a voluntary conveyance of his estates, not having any secret trust, and not having any arrangement whereby the deed could say one thing and the voluntary arrangement mean another; that the fact that he did intend to make a gift during his lifetime was no offence and no breach of the Act of Parliament, and nothing that could be considered tainted with the character of fraud.—Simms v. Registrar of Probates. That being so, it appears to me that it would be an abandonment of the principle which has been held sacred in this country if, when a person has done that which in itself may be innocent, you should simply, because you choose to suggest that it was done with the view of evading the payment of a tax, require the witness to disclose the whole of his affairs, and enable the private communications between himself and his solicitor to be displayed to the Court.—p. 648.

LORDS SHAND and DAVEY to the same effect. LORD BRAMPTON concurred.

LORD LINDLEY.—It is said that, the testator being dead, the privilege is gone. I am satisfied that that answer is insufficient. It struck one at once as curious. I never heard it stated before; but it does appear that in Russell v. Jackson it was considered, and in the judgment of Turner, V.-C. there are some passages which have been invoked in favour of that being a good answer; but they are easily explainable when one comes to look at them. The mere fact that a testator is dead does not destroy the privilege. The privilege is founded upon the views which are taken in this country of public policy, and that privilege has to be weighed, and unless the people concerned in the case of an ordinary controversy like this waive it, the privilege is not gone—it remains. In the case before Turner, V.-C., for the reasons which were given by counsel for the respondent, and which are apparent in the judgment, the privilege could not be set up. One person was trying to set it up against the other, both claiming under the testator, and the V.-C. held that it could not be set up.—p. 650.

It is quite plain that the rules which would guide the Court as to what affidavit of documents was necessary from a party to the action representing a department of the State are entirely different from the rules which would be applied in a case where the officer of a department was merely subpoenaed as a witness. The officer of the department is merely the custodian of the documents as the servant of the department, and the department here [Income Tax Commissioners] have not put forward their servant as representing the department.—p. 186.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The later cases lay down that a door which is only fastened by a latch or other like fastening may be opened. I think that is going a long way, and I am not surprised that the Courts in America have not gone so far as the Court of Exchequer. (His lordship had cited Curtis v. Hubbard (1 Hill N. Y. 336) as opposed to Regan v. Shilcock.) In former times a landlord could not for the purpose of distressing open an outer door. In Regan v. Shilcock, by which we are bound, it was held that he may open a door which is closed but not fastened. I presume that rests on the implied licence to any person who has lawful business with the occupier to enter the house in that way. But that is an exceptional case standing on its own ground which does not apply to a window.—p. 554.

MELLOR, J.—With reference to the point that the distress was lawful because the entry of the broker was through the door, I observe that in Sandon v. Jervis, Hill, J. said, "I think that the officer touching the plaintiff through the pane, had as much right to make the arrest through the pane as he would have had to go at once into the house and make the arrest if the door had been left open by the owner, or even broken by third parties and then left open." But there he was dealing with the facts of that case, and the finding of the jury. There the officer had nothing to do with the breaking of the pane; he simply availed himself of the broken pane, and therefore the arrest was valid. Here the defendant had suggested the opening of the window, and we may reasonably infer that it was for the purpose of taking advantage of it for effecting the distress. That circumstance distinguishes the present from Standon v. Jervis, and makes the distress not lawful.—p. 535.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question, then, is what limitation has the law imposed upon the right of the landlord to go into a house and distrain? . . . If a building is within a curtilage, it has been held that, though the landlord gets into the curtilage without breaking anything, he cannot go into the house if, to do so, he has to break anything. That shows that the fact of the landlord being within a curtilage does not affect the case so far as regards the house; and that within this law, the curtilage is no part of the house. Therefore it is not true to say in this case that the landlord's bailiff could not go into the house to distrain because he first climbed over the wall of the curtilage. But even supposing that the curtilage is part of the house, the bailiff did not break into the curtilage. He did not break open any door or anything else; he merely got over the wall. I can see no difference between that and getting over the wall of the house into the window, or placing a ladder from outside the yard wall against the house, and thus getting in at an open window. In my opinion the decision in Eldridge v. Stacey was perfectly right. . . . It is impossible to think that Byles, J., in Scott v. Buckley (16 L. T. 573), decided contrary to Eldridge v. Stacey, and therefore some fact must have been omitted from the report of that case which would account for the decision.

Johnson v. Upham (1859) 28 L. J. Q. B. 252; 2 El. & El. 250; 5 Jur. (N.S.) 681.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The case relied upon by the defendants was that of Ellis v. Taylor, in which the Court held upon the authority of two previous cases that a tender after impounding a distress for rent was too late. The two cases were Thomas v. Harries, in which Maule, J. differed from the other judges, and Ladd v. Thomas. Undoubtedly those cases are authorities upon the point; but notwithstanding these decisions the judges of this Court who have heard the argument were unanimously of opinion that upon the equity of the statute of William and Mary before referred to, an action is maintainable for selling goods distrained for rent after tender of the rent and expenses, though the tender be made after the impounding.—p. 257.

HILL, J.—In the report in Neville & Manning, it is said: "By the Court—It is clear that the tender to the landlord was a good tender"; and it is added, at the end of a short judgment, "the tender to Nash" [the man in possession] "was rendered invalid by the refusal to pay, unless a receipt was given." This dictum was wholly unnecessary and beside the question, as the Court had held the other tender good.—p. 13.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—It is reasonable to confine the statute (56 Geo. 3, c. 50, s. 11) to purchasers from the tenant. And there is authority for this construction. The case of Abbey v. Petch, decided in 1841, no doubt, conflicts with our view; but there appears to have been a previous decision of the same Court the other way, which was not mentioned to the Court during that argument, and that is Jones v. Hamp, in 1840. This we learn from the report in Frusher v. Lee, in 1842, where the decision in Abbey v. Petch was considered and strongly commented on by the Court. But in 1851 we have a later decision in the same Court precisely on all fours with the present, Ridgway v. Lord Stafford, in which case Abbey v. Petch was considered and virtually overruled. But it was suggested that the obiter dicta of the very learned judges who decided Wilmot v. Rose throw some doubt upon the decision in Ridgway v. Lord Stafford. However, when we refer to the more extended report in the Law Journal, it is gratifying to find the very same distinction taken that I took in the argument in this case; for Crompton, J. remarked, arguendo, that Ridgway v. Lord Stafford was the case of "a sale by the landlord, and this is an Act for the protection of landlords from sales upon the lands held by their tenants." Hence all conflict between the cases ceases; for, while concurring with the Queen's Bench that it would be wrong to confine the words "any purchaser" to purchasers under an execution, it is still quite consistent with their decision to limit the operation of the section to purchasers from the tenant, as Crompton, J. appears to suggest.

KAY, L.J.—That case was decided on demurrer to a plea that a bill of exchange was given for rent, but not averring that it was taken in satisfaction or with the intention of suspending the landlord's remedy. On demurrer such a plea was held to be insufficient; but that is not an authority that the giving of the bill was no evidence of an agreement to suspend the landlord's right of distress, had such an agreement been averred.

PARKE, B. (for the Court).—From some passages in the judgment of Lord Denman in the Queen's Bench, in Fletcher v. Marillier (if the report be correct), it would appear that the difference between the time of removal and of seizure was not adverted to; but the case itself is distinguishable, as the plea admitted the goods at the time of seizure to be the property of and in the possession of the tenant, and no colour of title was given to the plaintiff; and that is pointed out as a cause of special demurrer, and also relied upon in the judgment.—p. 629.

REMEDY FOR WRONGFUL DISTRESS.

Taylor v. Hemmiker (1840) 12 A. & E. 488; 4 P. & D. 243; 9 L. J. Q. B. 383.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—We should have considered the plaintiff as clearly entitled to a verdict for nominal damages, but that we paused in consequence of the two novi prius cases of Avenell v. Croker and Wilkinson v. Terry. Now, the first of these cases proceeds on the ground that, as only one thing was taken, and that must have been equally taken if the right sum had been distrained for, no damage accrued, and, therefore, the plaintiff had no cause of action. The same reasoning applies, though many things be taken, if their value be less than the rent really due, and for which the distress ought to have been. The verdict was for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made on another ground, and the parties agreed to a stet processus; but the ruling of Lord Tenterden on the above point was not questioned. In the latter case, Parke, B. doubted as to the action being maintainable, but a verdict was taken for nominal damages. With all possible respect for the opinion of those learned judges, we cannot agree to the doctrine contained in those cases.—p. 491.

Tancred v. Leyland (1851) 16 Q. B. 669; 20 L. J. Q. B. 316; 15 Jur. 394.—EX. CH.
PARKE, B. (for Exchequer Chamber).—The defendant, however, relies upon the decision of a similar question in the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Taylor v. Henniker, in which it was laid down that a distress under pretence that more was due than really was due was unlawful in its inception, the sale being mere matter of aggravation. We do not think that case was well decided. On the argument no authority was cited in favour of the decision; and those above referred to, in Rolfe's Abrid. and the Year Book were not brought before the Court. Some nisi prius authorities, which were cited, were in favour of the defendant; that of Lord Tenterden in the case of Arenell v. Croker (supra) in particular. And that of Lord Abinger in Crowder v. Self (2 Moo & Rob. 190) was not cited. We are not satisfied with that decision of the Queen's Bench; and think that it should be overruled.—p. 680.

JAMES, L.J.—The case of Ackroyd v. Smith has been misapprehended. It was there in substance said to the defendants, "In any view of the case, you are wrong. If this was a right of way appurtenant to a particular property, it could only be used for purposes connected with that property, and you have been using it for other purposes. If it was not, then it was a right in gross, and could not be assigned to you." The case involved no decision that the right of way was in gross.—p. 655.

LORDS WATSON, SHAND and DAVEY.

LORD DAVEY.—I cannot doubt that the easement as finally alleged by the respondents was a good easement in law. It is, in fact, a claim to divert the water which either has flooded or, if undiverted, would flood their lands, and to come on the appellant's land for the purpose of regulating the flow of the water with that object. It appears to me directly connected with the enjoyment of the respondents' lands by the occupiers thereof. The appellant, however, argues that the right claimed is to protect not only the respondents' lands, but the lands of other proprietors, from floods. The answer is: That is not the right claimed, and we are not dealing here with any excess in the exercise of the easement, but with the question whether the corporation have the right which they claim. The appellant's counsel quoted several cases, of which Ackroyd v. Smith may be taken as an example. It was there held that you cannot annex to land rights by way of easement unconnected with the enjoyment of land, as, for example, a right of way to be used for all purposes. There is no doubt about this sound principle of law; but it appears to me to have nothing to do with the present case, in which the claim is only for the protection of the respondents' own lands.—p. 776.

W. R. 465.—L.C., dicta of LORD CHELMSFORD dissenting from.

Allen v. Seckham (supra), in C.A.

JAMES, L.J.—In Miles v. Tobin, Lord Chelmsford used some expressions which are strongly in the plaintiffs' favour, but they were wholly extra-judicial, for nothing in that case turned on notice. The defendants knew that the plaintiffs derived titles from the same grantors as themselves, the common grantors being the trustees of a charity. The Court came to the conclusion that the lease under which the plaintiffs claimed, and which was prior to the lease to the defendants, bound the plaintiffs to build according to particular plans; the lease, therefore, if not in express terms, at all events by necessary implication, gave the plaintiffs a right to the use of the windows prescribed by those plans. This was a right granted by deed, which bound the adjoining lands of the grantors, apart from any question of notice. Any person who buys land in this country, buys subject to the chance that the vendor may have granted all manner of rights over it, and against this chance he guards himself by taking the covenants of the vendor. The case of Miles v. Tobin was simply one of a grant by deed made by the person under whom the defendants derived title, and the remarks of Lord Chelmsford, which have been relied on, were a mere obiter dictum, which appears to have remained in the Weekly Reporter, and not to have found its way into any other books so as to become part of our traditional law. We therefore do not consider ourselves bound by it, and we think that such an extension of the law as to constructive notice would be dangerous and unwarranted.—p. 795.

BYRNE, J.—Lord Dynevor v. Tennant does not involve the present point, and assuming it decides that you must regard a right of way as having been made with reference to the existing interest in the dominant tenement, that does not preclude the question raised in this case as to the effect of a particular grant or contract where a larger interest in the dominant tenement is subsequently acquired.

Barkshire v. Grubb (1881) 18 Ch. D. 616; 50 L. J. Ch. 731; 45 L. T. 383; 29 W. R. 929.

FRY, J.—The authorities would seem to be quite clear, but for the two latter cases of Thomson v. Waterlow and Langley v. Hammond, which I think, unfortunately, introduced a distinction into the law on the question. They have given some countenance to the proposition that when the general words used in a grant of land are "together with all ways therewith now used, occupied or enjoyed," and there is a road then actually used with the land granted, which has been constructed over adjoining land of the grantor, but such road did not exist before the unity of possession, a right of way over that road will not pass; but that will pass only if the road had existed before the unity of possession. One asks, why, on principle, should this distinction exist? If the way is actually used at the time when the grant is made, why should it not pass by the grant? And accordingly the doubt which was introduced by those cases seems to have been dispelled by the cases of Kay v. Oxley and Watts v. Kelson, which have restored the law, as it had been settled by the earlier decisions.—p. 621.

FARWELL, J.—Watts v. Kelson, on which the plaintiff relied, is not really in point, because the whole of the basis on which I rest my judgment was absent in that case. There was no question of an artificial watercourse having been made for one property only. The artificial watercourse in that case was made for the express purpose of providing both the properties with water. The question raised in the present case was not argued; the point did not arise; the only point was whether a quasi-easement, which would by its nature have been an easement if there had not been common ownership, passed by the grant, and it was held that it did. In the present case that is entirely excluded, because I hold that there was no quasi-easement which could pass by the grant, by reason of its precarious nature.

LORD WESTBURY, L.C.—This observation leads me to notice the fallacy in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Pyer v. Carter, being one of two cases on which his honour relies. In Pyer v. Carter, the owner of two houses sold and conveyed one of them to a purchaser absolutely, and without any reservation, and he subsequently sold and conveyed the remaining house to another person. It appeared that the second house was drained by a drain that ran under the foundation of the house first sold, and it was held that the second purchaser was entitled to the ownership of the drain, that is, to a right over the freehold of the first purchaser, because, said the learned judges, the first purchaser takes the house "such as it is." But, with great respect, the expression is erroneous, and shows the mistaken view of the matter, for in a question, such as this was, between the purchaser and the subsequent grantee of his vendor, the purchaser takes the house, not "such as it is," but such as it is described, and sold and conveyed to him in and by his deed of conveyance; and the terms of the conveyance in Pyer v. Carter were quite inconsistent with the notion of any right or interest remaining in the vendor. It was said by the Court that the easement was "apparent," because the purchaser might have found it out by inquiry; but the previous question is, whether he was under any obligation to make inquiry, or would be affected by the result of it, which, having regard to his contract and conveyance, he certainly was not under the circumstances of the case of Pyer v. Carter, the true conclusion was, that, as between the purchaser and the vendor, the former had a right to stop and block up the drain where it entered his premises, and that he had the same right against the vendor's grantee. I cannot look upon the case as rightly decided, and must wholly refuse to accept it as any authority.—p. 259.

MARTIN and CHANNELL, BB., said that it has been doubted, but is confirmed, and its principle explained by Ewart v. Cochran (4 Macq. H. L. Cas. 117) and Hall v. Lund (1 H. & C. 676).

LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—The defendants insisted that if an easement is apparent and continuous, no express reservation is necessary in a grant of the servient by the owner of the dominant tenement. And they relied on Pyer v. Carter, where it was held that if the owner of two or more adjoining houses sells and conveys one of them to a purchaser, such house is entitled to the benefit and is subject to the trust burden of all existing drains communicating with the other house, without express reservation or grant or that purpose. Lord Westbury, however, in the case of Suffield v. Brown (supra), refused to accept the case of Pyer v. Carter as an authority, and said: "It seems to me more reasonable and just to hold, that if the grantor intends to reserve any right over the property granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant rather than limit and cut down the operation of a plain grant (which is not pretended to be otherwise than in conformity with the contract between the parties) by the fiction of an implied reservation. I entirely agree with this view. It appears to me to be an immaterial circumstance that the easement should be apparent and continuous, for non constat that the grantor does not intend to relinquish it unless he shows the contrary by expressly reserving it. The argument of the defendants would make every case of this kind an implied reservation by law. And yet the law will not reserve anything out of a grant in favour of the grantor; except in case of necessity; as is the case put by the Court in Clerk v. Cogge (Cro. Jac. 170). "If a man hath four closes lying together, and sells three of them, reserving the middle close, and hath not any way thereto but through one of those which he sold, although he reserved not any way, yet he shall have it as reserved to him by law."—p. 590.

Carter* is good sense and good law. Most of the common law judges have not approved of Lord Westbury's observations on it.

THE SINGER, L.J.—I now come to Pyer v. Carter, which seems to break the hitherto unbroken current of authority upon this point, and there can be no doubt that Sir Henry Jackson is justified in saying that if that case is right this appeal ought to be allowed. That was a case of a somewhat special character. [The lord justice then stated the facts of the case.] Now, although it is possible that the actual decision in Pyer v. Carter was not exactly overruled, the principles there laid down were clearly and distinctly overruled by the same Court in White v. Bass (7 H. & N. 722); the facts of which case were these: A man was the owner of certain land and of a certain house which had windows through which the light, not as an easement but as a matter of enjoyment, had come for some time. He let the land (reserving the house) to trustees, subject to certain covenants by which they were to build in a particular manner upon the land, and if these covenants had been complied with, and they had built in the specific manner, there would have been no obstruction to the lights of the house which the grantor or the lessor reserved. Therefore if we were entitled in these cases to go back to matters which existed before the time of the conveyance, we should have found here, as clearly as could be shown, an intimation on the part of the lessor that if the building was to be permitted on the adjoining land, it was only to be permitted under such conditions as would prevent the lights of the house being obstructed. But that being originally the position of matters, it was followed by a conveyance of the reversion in the land to the trustees, and subsequently to that conveyance the house was conveyed to another person, and buildings having been put upon the land occupied by the trustees contrary to the terms of the original covenant, and of such a kind as obstructed the lights of the house, an action was brought by the person to whom the house was conveyed. In that action it was decided that the defendant held his land unfettered by the original covenant, and unfettered by any implied reservation, and that he was entitled to build in such a way as he thought proper on his land, although the effect of what he did might be to obstruct the lights of the plaintiff. In giving judgment, Lord Chief Baron Pollock says this (at p. 730): "My brother Petersdorff has cited no authority for the precise matter which he has urged before us, and I think that in construing a conveyance of land we must collect what the parties intended from the language they have used. It seems to me that we cannot look into the lease of the 2nd of October, 1855, for it is merged in the fee, a conveyance of the reversion having been made to the lessees, and we must look to that conveyance alone in order to ascertain the rights of the parties. In that conveyance there is no covenant by the purchasers not to build on the land so as to obstruct the light and air coming to the windows of the plaintiff's house, or indeed any limitation of the right to use the land." Now, no case can be more clear and distinct upon the point which we have to decide to-day, and the case is admitted by Sir Henry Jackson to be such, but he suggested that we ought to overrule it as being an exception to the general current of authority. So far from that being the case, Pyer v. Carter appears to me to have been the exception, and not White v. Bass.

The latter case was followed by Suffield v. Brown. A good deal has been said about that case; and the principles upon which this Court ought to act in dealing with decisions of Courts of co-ordinate authority have been also discussed. I think I may say for myself (and I believe I am expressing the views of the other members of the Court) that we ought not to lay down as an absolute rule that decisions of Lord Chancellors, at all events sitting alone, are to be taken as decisions of the Court of Appeal, and absolutely binding on this Court so as to prevent us from even looking into the grounds or considering the case which was before the particular Lord Chancellor. But no doubt the greatest weight ought to be given to such decisions, and unless they are shown to be manifestly contrary to the general current of authority on the point decided, it appears to me that we ought not to take upon ourselves to overrule them.

That being so, let us look a little more narrowly into that case. First, we have to see what was decided—and by that I do not mean what was absolutely necessary to be decided, but what really the Lord Chancellor took upon himself to decide, and, although he might have decided the case upon other grounds, put as his ratio decidendi. Upon that point there can be no doubt. We have only to read the close of this judgment to see that he put it entirely on this principle, which I have stated as the second of the general rules applicable to cases of this kind, that a man cannot derogate from his own grant, and that as a general rule no implication can be made of a reservation of an easement to the grantor, although there may be an implication of a grant to the grantee. The Lord Chancellor closes his judgment by saying (having dealt with some of the authorities as to continuous and apparent easements): "But this is irrelevant to my decision, which is founded on the plain and simple rule that the grantor, or any person claiming under him, shall not derogate from the absolute sale and grant which he has made." Although, therefore, it is perfectly true that, looking to the special circumstances of the case, it might have been decided upon those special circumstances so as even to admit the proposition for which Sir Henry Jackson contends, it is equally clear that the Lord Chancellor did not so decide the case, but decided it upon a distinct negative of that proposition. If we were to stop here, it seems to me that, looking to the fact that this was not a case in which this point in question was mooted for the first time, but that the point had been mooted and decided as early as the third year of the reign of Queen Anne, we should not be justified in doing anything but follow the principles enunciated by Lord Westbury.

But Suffield v. Brown (at p. 185) has been confirmed by an equally high authority, for in Crosley & Sons v. Lightowler, Lord Chelmsford as Lord Chancellor had to deal with a similar question, and he there says:—"Lord Westbury, however, in the case of Suffield v. Brown, refused to accept the case of Pyer v. Carter as an authority, and said, 'It seems to be more reasonable and just to hold that if the grantor intends to reserve any right over the property granted it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant rather than to limit and cut down the operation of a plain grant (which is not pretended to be otherwise than in conformity with the contract between the parties) by the fiction of an implied reservation.' I entirely agree with this view. It appears to me to be an immaterial circumstance that the easement should be apparent and continuous, for non cogitatus that the grantor does not intend to relinquish it unless he shows the contrary by expressly reserving it. The argument of the defendants would make, in every case of this kind, an implied reservation by law; and yet the law will not reserve anything out of a grant in favour of a grantor except in case of necessity."

Now the only case in the Court of Appeal which is suggested as being contrary to this high authority of two Lord Chancellors, is Watts v. Kelson, and no doubt there are observations of Lord Justice Mellish to the effect that the order of conveyance in point of date is immaterial; that Pyer v. Carter is good sense and good law, and that most of the common law judges have not approved of Lord Westbury's observations. But putting aside for the moment that this was a mere dictum of the lord justice during the argument, I must observe that this is not exactly so, as in White v. Bass, the judges of the Court of Exchequer had distinctly, as regards the reasoning of Pyer v. Carter, overruled that case. No doubt also Lord Justice James says, "I am satisfied with the decision in Pyer v. Carter." But in the considered judgment of the Court, when, if it had been intended to say that Suffield v. Brown (at p. 185) was not law, one would have thought there would have been something distinct upon the point, there is not one word to the effect of that which had been said by the lords justices during the argument. All that is said about it is this. Lord Justice Mellish, who delivered the judgment, after referring to Nicholas v. Chamberlain (supra), said "This case has always been cited with approval, and is identical not only in principle but in its actual facts with the case now before us. It was expressly approved of by Lord Westbury in Suffield v. Brown, where, though he objected to the decision in Pyer v. Carter, in which it was held that a right to an existent continuous apparent easement was impliedly reserved in the conveyance by the owner of two houses in the alleged servient house, yet he seems to agree that the right to such an easement would pass by implied grant where the dominant tenement is conveyed first"; and that was the word of the Court of Appeal had to decide in Watts v. Kelson (supra). Therefore Watts v. Kelson is no authority to justify us in overruling Suffield v. Brown, still less for overruling it, supported as it is by the case of Crosley & Sons v. Lightowler.

The next case to which I will refer is Swanborough v. Corentry, which has been cited on both branches of the argument addressed to us by Sir Henry Jackson. That was a case of a sale by auction of different lots to different persons at the same time, and it was argued (and I particularly direct attention to this) that such a case must stand upon exactly the same footing as if the land in respect of which the easement was claimed had been conveyed first; consequently the case would be one in which a grant of the easement would be implied. Now observe what that admits, and the argument so dealt with upon that footing. It admits that priority in time of the conveyance was a material point for consideration; because, if it had not been admitted, then the Court might have gone to the general question, not whether the conveyances were at the same time, not whether one preceded the other by a few minutes, or a few days, or by a few years; but whether upon the severance of the property there was this (if I may use the expression) continuous and apparent easement in respect of which a reservation might be claimed, or an implication of a grant might be made. Tindal, C.J., deals with the matter, as it appears to me, upon the supposition that the general maxim is, that a man who conveys property cannot derogate from his grant by reserving to himself impliedly any continuous apparent easements; he says (at p. 309), "It is well established, this general rule of law." It appears to me, therefore, that this is a decision which fortifies the previous decision of Lord Holt [in Tenant v. Goldwin, 2 Ld. Raym. 1089, 1093]—p. 51.

JESSEL, M.R.—There can be no doubt that the law as laid down by Palmer v. Fletcher is the law of the present day: that is, that where a man grants a house in which there are windows, neither he nor anybody claiming under him can stop up the windows, or destroy the lights. That is based on the principle that a man shall not derogate from his own grant; and it makes no difference whether he grants the house simply as a house, or whether he grants the house with the windows or the lights thereto belonging. In both cases he grants with the apparent easements or quasi-easements. All that is now, I take it, settled law (p. 357). . . . The last case on the subject is Wheeldon v. Burrows; as far as I understand the decision of the Appeal Court in that case, the exception in Swanborough v. Corentry (supra) and Compton v. Richards (1 Price 27), was approved. In Swanborough v. Corentry the case was open to great doubt. There was a sale by auction which we have not here; and there is something here which was not there. There was there, and here, a continuous and apparent easement. In the judgment in Wheeldon v. Burrows, the case is treated as an exception to the general rule, that if a grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. The late Lord Justice Thesiger says this: "It is said that, even supposing the maxims which I have stated to be correct, this case is an exception which comes within the rule laid down in Swanborough v. Corentry and Compton v. Richards, namely, that although the land and houses were not, in fact, conveyed at the same time, they were conveyances made as part and parcel of one intended sale by auction." Then he says that will not do. Then he goes on to say, "In the cases which have been cited the conveyances were founded upon transactions which, in equity, were equivalent to conveyances between the parties at the time when the transactions were entered into, and those transactions were entered into at the same moment of time, and as part and parcel of one transaction." So that he evidently means to say that such a case as that is an exception to the general rule, and you cannot block up the lights.—p. 358.

COTTON, L.J.—If there had been an express grant, then it would have been the duty of the grantor or of the lessor to expressly state what right he reserved to himself. A reservation of right to a grantor is a very different thing from an obligation impliedly undertaken by a grantor, because when there is a reservation to himself, that is a reservation from that which he has in terms granted; and if a lessor or other grantor wants to make any reservation in his own favour, then, in my opinion that stands on a very different footing from any implied obligation contracted by him in consequence of the position in which he places himself. Wheeldon v. Burrows is a case which on that point would be a strong authority, and which I, of course, agree with. But, in my opinion, when we come to the question which arises here of implied obligation and implied grant, we may have regard to all the circumstances existing at the time when the parties undertook the position from which the implied obligation arises, and, looking at the circumstances existing at the time when the lease was made, I am of opinion that here the plaintiffs cannot assert any implied obligation on the part of the corporation which will enable the plaintiffs to say that there is an interference with any implied obligation on the part of the defendant, and that they are entitled to an injunction.—p. 605.

SMITH, L.J.—Prima facie, a grantee, in circumstances such as exist in the present case, has the right to have the light coming to his windows over the lands of the grantor unobstructed by the grantor. This was laid down in 1832 by Chief Justice Tindal, delivering the judgment of the C. P. in Swanborough v. Corentry. . . . Palmer v. Fletcher (supra) and other cases are cited in support of this proposition. I am not aware that this statement of the law as to the obligation of a vendor to his vendee has ever been doubted, and, on the contrary, I find the C. A. in 1878 in Wheeldon v. Burrows citing with approval this statement of the law by the C. P.; and again in Allen v. Taylor (in 1880) Sir G. Jessel, M.R., casts no doubt upon this proposition relating to the obligation of a grantor to his grantee. There being this prima facie right of a grantee, in circumstances such as exist in the present case, not to have his lights interrupted by his grantor, how, when the grantee brings an action against the grantor for derogating from this right, can the grantor show that what he is doing does not give a cause of action to his grantee, when a material interruption to his lights is established? In my opinion it can only be by the grantor showing that the prima facie right of the grantee is in some way limited and restricted. The burden of proof is upon the grantor; and if he does not show that this prima facie right which the grantee has is in some way cut down, and if a material diminution of the grantee's right by what the grantor has done upon his own land is established by the grantee, he is entitled to judgment. When Birmingham, Dudley and District Banking Co. v. Ross and Myers v. Catterson are examined, it appears that the above statement of the law is not impugned, and that each of these cases was decided upon the ground that the grantor was able to show that this prima facie right of the grantee was limited or restricted; or, in other words, the grantor was able to show what was the implied obligation which he, in fact, undertook when he sold to the grantee. In the one case, Birmingham, Dudley and District Banking Co. v. Ross, it was shown that it was perfectly well known to each party when the sale took place that the land was to be built upon by the corporation, i.e., the grantors, as they liked, subject only to this, that there was to be a passage of the width of twenty feet between the buildings of the grantors and the house of the grantee, and that this was the measure of the grantee's protection. In the other case, Myers v. Catterson, the grantors (the railway company) established that the grantee knew, at the date of the conveyance to him of the house, that the grantors required the remainder of the land for the purposes of the construction of their railway; and it was held that the obligation which the grantors (the railway company) undertook towards the grantee was limited by this—that the company might utilize their land for that purpose, but for no other, and that this was the measure of the grantee's protection.

RIGBY, L.J.—There remains the important distinction between the present case and that of Richards v. Rose, that, in the latter case, the mutual interdependence of the houses was the result of the building of them by an owner in fee, and was presumably intended to be perpetual; whilst in the present case, the support given by the 11 ft. 3 in. wall to the beams of the one-storey building on the adjacent land was the act of sub-lessees only, and was not intended by them, and could not have been made by them, more lasting than their own interests.—p. 67.

PARKE, B.—The extent of the authority of Holmes v. Goring is, that admitting a grant in general terms, it may be construed to be a grant of a right of way as from time to time may be necessary. I should have thought it means as much a grant for ever as if expressly inserted in the deed, and it struck me at the time that the Court was wrong; but that is not the question now.—p. 197.

BLACKBURN, J.—It seems to us settled by modern authority, that the ground on which the way of necessity is created is, that a convenient way is implied by grant as a necessary incident. It is observed by Parke, B., in Proctor v. Hodgson (24 L. J. Ex. Ch. 195), that the extent of the authority of Holmes v. Goring is, that though it is a grant it may be construed to be a grant of such a right of way as from time to time may be necessary. He adds, "I should have thought it meant as much a grant for ever as if expressly inserted in the deed, and it struck me at the time that the Court was wrong." We certainly do not feel inclined to extend the authority of Holmes v. Goring so far as to hold that the person into whose possession the servient tenement comes may from time to time vary the direction of the way of necessity at his pleasure, so long as he substitutes a convenient way. We think we must hold that the way of necessity, once created, must remain the same way as long as it continues at all.—p. 1198.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—No doubt you may in particular cases, in which particular matters have been the subject of complaint, find observations by learned judges to the effect that railway companies do not possess the same unlimited powers of using their land as ordinary individuals would have; in other words, that they are not at liberty to use their land otherwise than for purposes consistent with the purposes of the Act of Parliament under which they are incorporated. But when it comes to a question as to the way in which land may be ordinarily enjoyed by a proprietor who derives his title under Acts of Parliament, and for purposes specified in Acts of Parliament, you have the observations made by Lords Cairns and Hatherley in the case of Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co., which go very strongly to the effect of showing that the provisions of such Acts are not to interfere with the ordinary rights which proprietors otherwise would have. Certain observations made by Malins, V.-C., in the case of Norton v. London & N. W. Railway Co. have been very much relied upon. But, if that case is looked into, it will be seen that it was decided on a collateral point, namely, that the railway company had been guilty of trespass, and to the extent to which they had been guilty of trespass the injunction was continued, though it was limited to that portion of the complaint with respect to which there had been a trespass.—p. 9.

LINDLEY, M.R.—These defendants, apart from all statutory powers, are not exercising the rights of riparian owners at all. They are diverting the water from this lake, not for their own purposes, not for the use, either ordinary or extraordinary, of the land of which they are owners, but for a totally different purpose—that of supplying townships some distance off. That is no exercise of the right of a riparian proprietor within the meaning of the law laid down in the cases to which I have referred; and if we look at Stouton Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co., we find that Lord Cairns alludes to the distinction. He says: "I think your lordships will find . . . flow towards the north." Then he says that the use being made by the waterworks company in that case was not a use by them in the exercise of their rights as riparian proprietors, but for a totally different purpose. So it is here. Therefore, I take it, the defendants cannot justify what they are doing under the common law doctrine as to riparian owners.

Per LINDLEY, M.R. and RIGBY, L.J.—Whether Popplewell v. Hodgkinson is an authority that in no circumstances can there be a right to support to land from underground water, quære.

Per VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Popplewell v. Hodgkinson is a clear authority that there is no right, and that a landowner is under no obligation at common law so to deal with his land as not to withdraw water support from the land of another person.

Buckley p. Buckley (1898) 67 L. J. Q. B. 953; [1898] 2 Q. B. 608.—C.A. SMITH, RIGBY and WILLIAMS, L.J.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely dissent from the suggestion that the doctrine of Pomfret v. Ricroft in any way limits the liability of the defendants to the plaintiffs. It cannot be denied that prior to the time when the plaintiffs acquired a right to use the water in the goit, the predecessors in title of the defendants, having established an artificial stream on his land, came under an obligation to the owners of adjoining lands, including the owners of the plaintiffs' land, to take care that the water conducted along that artificial stream did not break loose and cause damage to those owners. It is suggested, however, that the owners of the plaintiffs' land having now established a right to a flow of water along that stream, it may be taken under Pomfret v. Ricroft—first, that the owner of the servient tenement is under no obligation to execute such repairs as are necessary to the enjoyment of the easement, and also that the owners of the dominant tenement could not sue the owners of the servient tenement for not doing such repairs; but it seems to me that this in no way gets rid of the antecedent obligation on the owners of the goit here so to maintain it that the water shall not break-out and injure the lands of adjoining proprietors, including those of the plaintiffs. I am of opinion that the easement which the plaintiffs have acquired, and the consequential right of executing such repairs as are necessary to enable them to enjoy that easement, have not lost them the right to insist on the obligation which prima facie lies on the defendants, so to maintain the goit as that the water shall not break out and flood their land.—p. 955.

CLEASBY, B.—With reference to one case that has been referred to, that of Martin v. Goble, I confess that the decision in that case appears to me to a certain extent to be in favour of Mr. Pollock's view, but it is wholly inconsistent, in my opinion, with the case of Tupling v. Jones (11 H. L. Cas. 290). According to the marginal note in Martin v. Goble, if a building, after having been used for twenty years as a malt-house, is turned into a dwelling-house, in its new state it is only entitled to the same degree of light that was necessary to it in its former state, and the owner of the adjoining ground may lawfully erect a wall which prevents the admission of sufficient light for domestic purposes. In that case, the Chief Baron said that it was necessary to enquire with regard to what extent the light was sufficient for the building as a malt-house. But Tupling v. Jones is conclusive to show that where the building has been erected and has existed for twenty years, and the light has actually been received into the windows for that period, the right to the whole quantity of light that passed through these windows is indefeasible.—p. 49.

MELLOR, J.—With regard to the case of Martin v. Goble, I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls in Aynsley v. Glover (L. R. 18 Eq. 544; 10 Ch. 283, infra), in thinking that the actual mode of occupation of the dominant tenement is not the test. I am, therefore, of opinion that the test applied by McDonald, C.B., in Martin v. Goble, was not the correct test. It seems to me that the owner of the dominant tenement is entitled to all the light that has been accustomed to come through the particular aperture or window without challenge on the part of the owner of the servient tenement. How is the owner of the servient tenement concerned with, or how can he know anything about, the mode of occupation of the dominant tenement? In Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie (L. R. 4 Eq. 421), an injunction was claimed on the ground that the access of light had been so far diminished that the room could no longer be used as a sampling room. The injunction was refused, on the ground that it was not shown that the room had been so used for twenty years; and it is said that the Vice-Chancellor in that case approved of the views in Martin v. Goble. I cannot agree with the Vice-Chancellor that the use of a room as a sampling room for twenty years would, in any other sense, have been material than as a test of the amount of light that had been accustomed to find access to the room during those years.—p. 180.

ROMER, L.J. (for the Court).—The precise point arising in this case was clearly dealt with by Lord Justice Mellish in Kalk v. Pearson, where he says, "I cannot think that it is possible for the law to say that there is a certain quantity of light which a man is entitled to, and which is sufficient for him, and that the question is, whether he has been deprived of that quantity of light. It appears to me that it is utterly impossible to make any rule or adopt any measure of that kind. It is essentially a question of comparison, whether by reason of deprivation of light the house is substantially less comfortable than it was before." This statement has been since approved of and followed in many cases, and we believe it accurately states the existing law on the subject. So far as other judges have in their judgments used expressions which appear to, or do in fact, conflict with what Lord Justice Mellish has said, those expressions cannot, in our opinion, be justified. And in particular we may say that the opposing views expressed by Malins, V.-C., in Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie and Dickinson v. Harbottle cannot now be regarded as sound.

LORD WESTBURY, J.C.—As observed by Lord Eldon, the Court will not interfere upon every degree of darkening ancient lights and windows; but the standard of the amount of damage that calls for the exercise of the jurisdiction to grant preventive relief, or to prohibit the continuance of the nuisance, has not been defined with any certainty. In Att.-Gen. v. Nichol, which was an application for an injunction to restrain the building of a wall which would darken the ancient lights of the Scottish Hospital, Lord Eldon is represented as saying, at p. 342: "The foundation of this jurisdiction interfering by injunction, is that head of mischief alluded to by Lord Hardwicke—that sort of material injury to the comfort of the existence of those who dwell in the neighbouring house, requiring the application of a power to prevent, as well as remedy, an evil, for which damages, more or less, would be given in an action at law." The sentence is not very accurately worded, and when examined it amounts to this—that this Court will interfere by injunction. Probably the report, which in other respects is very inaccurate, does not do justice to the language of the noble and learned judge; and I think it may be collected that Lord Eldon meant to say, that where the darkening of the ancient windows of a dwelling-house has materially injured the comfort of the existence of those who dwell in it, the Court would interfere by injunction. This rule or standard would have no application to a manufactory or business premises which are not occupied otherwise than for the purposes of some trade or manufactory. But, upon a similar principle, where the obstruction of the ancient lights of a manufactory or of business premises render the building, to a material extent, less suitable for the business carried on in them, it is, in my judgment, a case for an injunction, and not merely for compensation in damages. . . . It is true, that in the same case of Att.-Gen. v. Nichol, Lord Eldon is reported to have said: "I repeat the observations of Lord Hardwicke, that a diminution of the value of the premises is not a ground," namely, not a ground for an injunction. But there is here again some error in the report. Lord Hardwicke made no such general observation. In the case referred to, which is that of Fishmongers' Co. v. East India Dock Co., Lord Hardwicke says: "It is not sufficient to say, it will alter the plaintiff's lights, for there no vacant piece of ground could be built upon in the City; and here there will be seventeen feet distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance. It is true, that the value of the plaintiff's house may be reduced by rendering the prospect less pleasant, but that is no reason to hinder a man from building upon his own ground." It is clear, therefore, that what Lord Hardwicke meant to determine, and did determine, was this—that the shutting out of a view or prospect will not afford a ground for the interference by way of injunction, even though it be attended by a diminution of the value of the premises. He did not decide that a diminution of value by the obstruction of ancient lights is not a ground for an injunction.—p. 689.

CROMPTON, J.—We were pressed with the argument that there was no greater amount of inconvenience to the servient tenement; and a case of Cooper v. Hubbuck was cited, where the Master of the Rolls was supposed to have held that a party having several windows in a house could put out an intermediate new window between two old ones, where no apparent detriment to the owner of the servient tenement appeared to arise therefrom. I wholly dissent from this doctrine. I think that the right to restrict the owner of the adjoining land from building on his own land, gained by user or grant, must be confined to the subject-matter of such user or grant, and that the restriction on the owner of the servient tenement must be substantially the same, according to the rule as laid down in Blanchard v. Bridges.—p. 867.

FRY, J.—Blanchard v. Bridges appears to me to have proceeded on this: there was that which the Court held amounted to an implied grant of a right to have certain windows, and an implied licence or covenant not to obstruct the access to certain windows; and the whole question was, what was the extent to which that implied licence or covenant went? The facts were shortly these. The plaintiff had been allowed to erect windows looking east in his building or cottage. He then built out a projection five feet from the original house, two bays looking north and south, and also more or less east; and the question was, whether the original grant, licence, or covenant was to be deemed to protect these new windows. The Court held it was not. It was a mere question how far the implied grant, licence, or covenant was to be deemed to have gone. They say this: "A person might well acquiesce in the existence of a window of a given size, elevation, or position, because it was felt to be no annoyance to him; but to hold him to be thereby concluded as to some other window to which he might have the greatest objection, as to which he would never have assented if it had come in the first instance, would be an erroneous conclusion." Therefore I do not think that Blanchard v. Bridges is an authority for the use for which it has been used before me.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—Now, I am bound to say,

I feel very great difficulty in reconciling Renshaw v. Bean with Chandler v. Thompson. At the same time, I am bound to make this observation, that Lord Campbell expressly says the Court does not in any way mean to overrule the decision in Chandler v. Thompson; and he says, "We do not mean to say that there may not be many cases in which you may obstruct the light of a new window, although you have no right to obstruct the light of that portion which is the portion of the old window—that is, the aperture part of the new window, which was also part of the old window." But if the cases were not reconcilable, as Lord Campbell considers they were, still as Renshaw v. Bean is the decision of the Court in banc, when all the judges of the Court gave their opinion, and Chandler v. Thompson is a case at Nisi Prius, of course if there were any inconsistency Renshaw v. Bean would overrule Chandler v. Thompson.—p. 28.

FRY, J.—It is said, and said truly, that the cases proceed to a large extent upon observations with regard to the form and size of the aperture or window; and that is perfectly true, because of course, the opening in the dominant tenement is the limit which defines the boundaries of the space over the servient tenement; and therefore, it seems to me, it is that in all cases the Court has regard to the aperture in the dominant tenement by means of which the space over the servient tenement has been useful to the dominant tenement. Now, it is said that that conclusion is inconsistent with the definition of Lord Westbury in Tapling v. Jones. It appears to me it is not so, and that Lord Westbury, in referring to a window as equivalent to an access, in Tapling v. Jones, only says this, that the window in fact defines the access. And that that was the view taken by the House of Lords, seems to me confirmed by a passage from the judgment of Lord Chelmsford. . . . "By the Prescription Act then, after twenty years' user of the light, the owner acquires an absolute indefeasible right, which so far restricts the adjoining owner in the use of his own property that he can do nothing on his premises which may have the effect of obstructing him; the right thus acquired must, nevertheless, be confined to the exact dimensions of the opening through which the access of light and air has been permitted." In other words, he seems to me to say that the aperture, the opening through which the access of light has been admitted, is the measure of the access which you are to enjoy over the servient tenement.

SIR A. HOBHOUSE (for J.C.).—Tapling v. Jones was cited as an authority for the plaintiffs; but so far as it bears upon the point under discussion it favours the argument for the defendants. For the plaintiff in Tapling v. Jones, succeeded in getting protection for nothing but his ancient light; those very rays of light to which he had acquired an indefeasible right. . . . It may be inferred by the judgments [of Lord Westbury and Lord Chelmsford] that if the plaintiff in Tapling v. Jones had so mixed up his old lights with his new ones that they could not be distinguished he would have failed. It is true that in that case the protection given to the ancient light carried with it incidentally protection to the new lights. But the only reason why it did so was that the new lights could not be obstructed without obstruction to the ancient light. New lights are no encroachment, nor did the plaintiff's decree aggravate the defendant's servitude, for he was only prevented from building so as to obstruct the ancient lights.

Tapling v. Jones, considered

Newson v. Pender (1884) 27 Ch. D. 43; 52 L. T. 9; 33 W. R. 243.—C.A. BAGGALLAY, COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ.

COTTON, L.J.—It was contended on behalf of the defendants, as I understand the argument, that there was authority which showed that in respect to all those windows which were not coincident with the windows in the old house, the plaintiffs had lost their right, and Hutchinson v. Capestake was the case relied upon, whereas, upon the other hand, the plaintiff contended that Tapling v. Jones, in the House of Lords, overruled altogether what was laid down in Hutchinson v. Capestake, and that, according to the decision of the House of Lords in Tapling v. Jones, the plaintiffs remained entitled to their legal right, and to the protection of an injunction in respect of all those portions of their present windows which were coincident with any portion of the old lights in the old house and corresponded with any portion of the old lights.

In my opinion, Tapling v. Jones did not decide that. That case is reported both in the House of Lords and in the Court of Exchequer Chamber; and it was remarked by the judges that there the plaintiff had one window in his new building which was entirely coincident with—except that it had been reconstructed—the ancient light in the ancient building, and in my opinion all that Tapling v. Jones decided was this, that where there is a modern light in a reconstructed building coincident with an old light there, the right to be protected was not lost by putting other lights in the building which were not entitled to any protection from being ancient lights—that is to say, a neighbour could not, under the guise of these new lights having been added, claim to obstruct the windows in respect to which the right to an ancient light could be claimed. But that was not overruling the principle to be found in Hutchinson v. Capestake, as laid down by Lord Blackburn and Lord Bramwell. In that case what they decided was that there was no window in the new building which was coincident with the old windows, and therefore there was no light in the new building which could be considered as a continuance of any ancient light. Tapling v. Jones decided that, by constructing new windows, either by the side of or above or below the ancient light in a reconstructed building, the right in respect of it was not lost, and I can see no reason why, when a window is reconstructed, which has within its area the entire area of an old ancient light entitled to protection, if the building is reconstructed, with that in its exactly former position, the addition to the area of a new window which included the area of the old would destroy the right which would have existed if, instead of being within the same mullions, it had been an addition of a window just by the side of the old window. I understand the ruling to be that, although there is a portion of the ancient light coincident with a portion of the new light, yet if the new light does not include the area of the old light, or if there is not substantially the area of the ancient light included in the new, it cannot be said to be a continuance of the ancient light, and a plaintiff cannot seek protection in respect of the existing windows simply because he has got a little bit of the area of the ancient light included in the area of the new, which is not a continuance of the ancient light. There would be a question as to whether the plaintiffs here have at law a right in respect of a great many of these windows, but undoubtedly there are some of their windows which do include the entire area of the old lights, and, in my opinion, having regard to Tapling v. Jones, they are entitled in respect of the area of the old ancient lights included, substantially, in the area of the new lights, to protection.—p. 60.

GIFFARD, L.J.—That leaves only the other part of the case which has been argued, namely, the authority of Heath v. Bucknall. With respect to that case, I cannot take it as having been decided otherwise than upon its particular circumstances; those particular circumstances, as I gather them, being, that a very small and almost inappreciable proportion of the ancient window was preserved, and the rest was new; so that there would have been no material damages at law. But if this case is supposed to lay down the proposition that a plaintiff who, according to Tapling v. Jones, has clear legal rights cannot come to this Court and get protection for those rights, I entirely demur to such a conclusion. If, for instance, there is a house with three ancient windows, and it is desirable to add, at no great distance from those three ancient windows, two other windows, is it to be said that because those two other windows are to be placed in that position, the plaintiff is not to come into Court to preserve what has been decided in Tapling v. Jones to be his clear legal right? Such a conclusion would not be either according to principle or to the course of this Court. I take the course of this Court to be, that when there is a material injury to that which is a clear legal right, and it appears that damages, from the nature of the case, would not be a complete compensation, this Court will interfere by injunction.—p. 166.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now, if the case of Heath v. Bucknall was well decided, and there were no other case upon the subject, I should have great difficulty in holding that the plaintiffs are not so deprived [of their right to an injunction]. The principle of that case I understand to be this: that where the plaintiff has altered his ancient lights materially and in such a manner that the defendant cannot obstruct the additional or new lights without, to some extent, obstructing the ancient lights, so that by reason of the alteration the plaintiff must in time gain a right to the new or additional lights similar to that which he enjoyed as regards the ancient lights, then a Court of equity will not interfere at the instance of the plaintiff to grant an injunction, which would in effect preserve not only the ancient lights, but enable him to acquire a title to the new lights. But Heath v. Bucknall was, in that view of the case, overruled by Giffard, L.J., in Staught v. Burn. The Lord Justice Giffard, speaking of Heath v. Bucknall, says this [vide ante, sub Staught v. Burn]. . . . That amounts, in my view, to a decision to this effect, that if either by alteration of the windows themselves (that is, by adding new lights immediately adjoining), or by adding new lights in close proximity to the old windows, the plaintiff has altered the access of light in respect of quantity; yet, according to the decision in Tupling v. Jones (supra), he is still entitled to damages at law for any injury done to the ancient lights, and that being so entitled, if his case is otherwise one in which a Court of equity would grant an injunction, his title to that injunction is not affected by the circumstance either that he has added to the windows (that is, the ancient lights themselves), or that he has made new windows in close proximity to the ancient windows. Therefore, following the decision of the lord justice, which indeed I am bound to follow, and considering that the principle which he has enunciated is not reconcilable with the principle upon which I consider Heath v. Bucknall to have been decided. I hold that the defence which has been urged upon me, arising from the case of Heath v. Bucknall, cannot be sustained.—p. 547.

I must express my decided opinion that Jackson v. Duke of Newcastle is not law. Of course I should have no right to say so if there had been no other decision of a Court of equal jurisdiction: but there is such decision. The decision of Lord Cranworth in Yates v. Jack (L. R. 1 Ch. 295, 298), which is subsequent in point of date, is entirely in conflict with the decision of Lord Westbury in Jackson v. Duke of Newcastle. . . . I may mention, although it is not conclusive, that Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, had occasion to consider the decisions both of Jackson v. Duke of Newcastle and of Yates v. Jack, and he not only adhered (as of course being V.-C. he was bound to adhere), but he expressed an opinion in favour of the view taken by Lord Cranworth in Yates v. Jack.—p. 548.

no general principle, but turns on the construction of the particular deed referred to—a deed bearing no resemblance to the grant in the present case (p. 258). It is remarkable that Skull v. Glenister was not cited in the argument on Newcomen v. Coulson. It appears to us that if the two are inconsistent, we must follow Newcomen v. Coulson, but the cases may be reconciled (though the reasoning in the judgment of Williams, J. seems scarcely consistent with the latter case) by treating Skull v. Glenister as deciding only that if there is a private right of way to one close, it must not be used colourably with the real intention of going to a different though adjoining close.—p. 263.

S. RIGHT TO SUPPORT.

Humphries v. Brogden (1860) 12 Q. B. 739; 20 L. J. Q. B. 10; 15 Jur. 124, questioned Solomon v. Vintners' Co. (1859) 4 H. & N. 585; 28 L. J. Ex. 370; 5 Jur. (N.S.) 1177; 7 W. R. 613.—EX.

POLLOCK, C.B.—It seems to us that, in the absence of all evidence as to origin or grant, the only way in which such a right can be supported is that suggested by Lord Campbell in Humphries v. Brogden, namely, an absolute rule of law similar to that which is stated to have existed in the civil war. But there is no authority for any such rule to be found, at least none was stated to us. Lord Campbell compares it to a right to light. But that right is created by the express enactment of the sect. 3 of the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, before referred to. And it seems contrary to justice and reason that a man, by building a weak house adjoining to the house of his neighbour, can, if the weak house gets out of the perpendicular and leans upon the adjoining house, thereby compel his neighbour either to pull down his own house within twenty years, or to bring some action at law, the precise nature of which is not very clear; otherwise it is said an adverse right would be acquired against him.—p. 599.

COLLINS, J.—Weston v. Arnold establishes that a wall is not a party wall when it gets three feet above the roof of the adjoining building, unless there is some special statutory provision to make it a party wall above that height; and here, unless it is a party wall above that height, the provisions of sect. 59 [of the London Building Act, 1894] do not apply to make it be carried three feet above the roof of the higher building. The construction which is sought to be given to sect. 59 can only be got at by assuming in the appellant's favour the point which Weston v. Arnold decided.

COTTON, L.J.—Now, it was said that the learned judge followed a decision of the late Master of the Rolls in Hackett v. Baiss. It may be, that having regard to the pleadings in that case and the contention between the parties, the Master of the Rolls took it as an admitted fact between the parties that an erection at that particular angle would not in any way interfere substantially with the light for which the plaintiff sought protection; and if that was so, then in my opinion he was quite right in limiting the injunction in the way in which he did limit it, because when a matter is ripe for decision between the parties on a motion for injunction, it is quite right for the Court, and it is its duty so to mould its injunction that, having regard to the case made and the evidence before the Court, it may decide that which is ripe for decision, and prevent the question being raised de novo, which it might be on a motion to commit, if the injunction were simply granted in the ordinary form of an injunction to restrain from building or doing something else so as to interfere with the plaintiff's rights.—p. 285.

wood, V.-C.—Another difficulty which existed at the time I heard this case, has to my mind been removed by the recent decision in Yates v. Jack, namely, a suggestion in the previous case of Clarke v. Clark, whereby the Lord Chancellor appeared to indicate that there was some difference between the right to protection of a person residing in a town, and the right of a person residing in the country, who would have reason to expect a greater amount of light in his dwelling. I confess it always appeared to me there must have been some misapprehension of the view in which these observations were put forward by the Lord Chancellor, and I should not have felt much embarrassed by them (for they could have been explained), but for an apparent acquiescence in the same view on the part of Knight Bruce, L.J., in Robson v. Whittingham. But I cannot suppose the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Justice to mean that in reality there is any substantial difference between the right which a plaintiff has to seek the protection of this Court when he lives in a town, and that which he would have if he resided in the country (p. 248). That being so, I confess I should have felt more difficulty than I do now, had it not been for the recent decision in Yates v. Jack, which puts it beyond all doubt that the Lord Chancellor did not entertain the view which his observations in Clarke v. Clark were supposed to imply.—p. 249.

JAMES, L.J.—With regard to one point which was raised by Mr. Pearson in his very able argument, based upon Durell v. Pritchard, but upon which the Vice-Chancellor does not appear to have proceeded, that unless there was a clear case for a mandatory injunction as to the whole of the building, there was no case for the Court's interference, I think it is not safe to rely upon Durell v. Pritchard as establishing any such doctrine. I think this Court would not be slow to give relief in damages where, although no sufficient case for a mandatory injunction was made, it found that a case for substantial damages might be laid before a jury; and so the Court might by interfering under the powers of Lord Cairns' Act, prevent multiplicity of actions.—P. 218.

BOWEN, L.J.—In Kelk v. Pearson, Lord Justice James expressed an opinion that the statute (the Prescription Act) has in no degree altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of the right of excess of light. His language must not be misunderstood. Since the statute, as before, the right remains a right to have an amount of access of light to and through apertures in a house or building which would be sufficient for the use and occupation of the building. It is not a right in gross, but a right to light in connection with a "dwelling-house, workshop, or building;" the building, workshop, or dwelling-house being the means by which the light is enjoyed for a period of twenty years, and by which the right to enjoy it is acquired. But the right has been altered by an Act of Parliament in one and a very material sense. It used, in the absence of a specific agreement, to depend on the implication, derived from user, of some supposed covenant by the owner of the servient tenement, by which he was deemed to have precluded himself from thenceforward interfering with the access of light to the dominant tenement to the extent of such user. What the statute has done is to create a fresh origin for the right. The origin of the right is to be, not the supposition of any implied covenant—that is not necessary, provided you fulfil the requirements of the statute as to enjoyment for a certain period—not enjoyment as of right, but actual enjoyment. There may still, since the statute, be conventional agreements between the parties which dispense with the necessity of proving even the enjoyment for twenty years, but the statutory origin which it is necessary to consider in the present instance is an alleged enjoyment for twenty years.

BACON, V.-C.—Reference was made to the case of Uniland v. Worley, before the late Mr. Justice Pearson, in which that learned judge exercised the discretion vested in him by Lord Cairns' Act, by granting to the plaintiff 150*l.* as the proper compensation to be paid to the plaintiff by the defendant, instead of the injunction which the plaintiff sued for. I have no right, and certainly no inclination, to criticise the judgment thus referred to, but it must be observed that there was there no such undertaking as that which has been given by the defendant in the present case. The question there was (as such a question always must be), one of mere discretion, and that discretion must be exercised with an intimate knowledge of the facts of each particular case. I think I should err in principle, and I should disregard the decisions and reasons propounded by the late Master of the Rolls in Aynsley v. Glover (L. R. 2 Eq. 425; 43 L. J. Ch. 777); and in Krehl v. Burrell (L. R. 7 Ch. D. 551; L. R. 11 Ch. D. 146; 47 L. J. Ch. 353; 48 L. J. Ch. 252), if I undertook to say that I have authority to grant or to sell to the defendant against the will of the plaintiff a licence to commit that wrong, of which the plaintiff complains, in consideration of any money payment. On the contrary, I am bound to say, as was said in somewhat similar terms in the case of Scout v. Pape, that the way in which this case has been dealt with on the motion, precludes me from entering into this question.—p. 918.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court).—The question whether the Court has jurisdiction to award damages by way of compensation for an injury not yet committed, but only threatened and intended, is by no means free from difficulty. On the one hand this Court in Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., expressed a clear opinion against the existence of such jurisdiction. On the other hand, it has been very commonly assumed, and there are several observations by eminent judges favouring the view, that there is such a jurisdiction; and in Holland v. Worley the late Mr. Justice Pearson did award damages in lieu of an injunction which, if granted, would have been simply preventive, and in no sense mandatory. The question is one of very great importance; but we do not think it right to keep the parties waiting while we make up our minds upon it. If there is no such jurisdiction the order appealed from will be wrong. But, assuming the jurisdiction to exist, we are of opinion that, upon the facts of this case, the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction.

COTTON, L.J.—A good deal of reliance was rightly placed in the course of the argument on the case in Dyer. That case is thus stated: "Upon evidence in quare impedit for the vicarage of T., in the county of Worcester, parcel of the possessions of the college of Westminster, it was moved, whether the advowson thereof passed, in a lease for years made in the time of Edward VI. in the second year, to Sir T. S. (who was an adumal and attainted), by the name of 'all the hereditaments situate, lying, and being in T.' where the vicarage was"; and it was held that it did. We were unsuccessful in our endeavours to obtain the record of that case, and we do not know what the facts were upon which that decision was given, but it is expressly stated that it was "upon evidence in quare impedit." There was probably some evidence in that case which we have not here which had a bearing upon the decision of the Court in that case. If the grantor had had no other property in T., and had granted a lease of "all the hereditaments of the lessee situate, lying, and being in T." I should come to the conclusion that these words were intended to, and in my opinion, if intended, they can, include an advowson. It is no doubt difficult to see how an advowson, which is simply a right to present to a church in a particular place, can itself be situate in a place: yet it does concern land in a particular place. Therefore that decision would lay down, and I think correctly, that that description, although not in my opinion an appropriate one, may under certain circumstances, pass an advowson. I desire also to refer to Gully v. Exeter (Bishop), where a passage from Coke's Institutes [1st Instit. 19, b.; Co. Litt. Thomas's Edition, vol. i. 1511] is quoted, where he is dealing with the Statute of Westminster. He says this, that though "tenement" is the only word used in the statute "it includeth not only all corporate inheritances which are or may be holden, but also all inheritances rising out of any of those inheritances, or concerning or annexed to, or exercisable within the same though they lie not in tenure, as rents, estovers, commons, or other profits granted out of land, or uses, offices, dignities which concern land or certain places." Then Best, C.J., who is quoting that passage, says: "An advowson concerns land and a certain place," and that is what I think Mr. Wolstenholme suggested as explaining the description here, and showing that the words "situate in a certain place" are properly descriptive of an advowson. Against the case in Dyer, we must not disregard Kensley v. Langham, where there was a devise of all other the testator's messuages, cottages, closes, woodlands, and tenements in (among other places) Hardwick, and all other his lands and tenements not thereinafter devised. In the former gift referring to property in certain places there is the word "hereditament," and no doubt that would include an advowson.—p. 1118.

ROMER, J.—The words in the will, the testator's
 "real estate in the county of Lincoln," and the words "freehold hereditaments situate in the several parishes of Doncaster, &c." in Crompton v.
Jarratt, are both expressions which might include advowsons, although I agree they are not apt words to include them. I refer to what was said by Cotton, L.J. in Crompton v. Jarratt, and also to the observations of Bowen, L.J. In Crompton v. Jarratt, the Court, upon looking at the deeds as a whole, including the recitals, came to the conclusion that the words "hereditaments situated in the parish of Doncaster," although they might include the advowson in question in that action, did not include it, and should not be held to pass it on the true construction of the particular deed.—p. 592.

[Mr. Cox's manuscript notes were produced from Lincoln's Inn Library, and from them it appeared that in Kensey v. Langham (supra, col. 933) the word "hereditament" was relied upon in the decision of that case.]—Id.

GIBBS, C.J. (for the Court).—No decided case has been cited which bears directly upon the point in question, but certain expressions of De Grey, C.J., in Barrett v. Glabb, as it is reported in the later editions of Bac. Abr. tit.
 Simony, A., have been selected and relied upon as showing that where simony enters into any part of the contract, the whole conveyance made in pursuance of it is void. There certainly are passages in that report which taken by themselves seem to countenance this opinion;
 but it is to be observed, that the question then before the Court was confined to the next presentation only; that no such doctrine is to be found in the report of the same case by Blackstone, J., who joined in the judgment; and therefore it is very probable that the expressions relied upon are inaccurately reported, or may perhaps have been used with reference only to the next presentation, upon which alone the Court had to decide. Be this as it may, we certainly cannot be guided by so loose an authority, when the reasoning of the case leads us to a different conclusion.—p. 746.

BACON, V.-C.—I have a few words still to say with respect to Sir H. Jackson's argument that an election by ballot would have been wholly illegal. I cannot follow that at all, and having attended to the authorities referred to I cannot conceive anything to justify that assertion. . . . Faulkner v. Elger only decides that an election by ballot is not legal because it does not afford the opportunity for a scrutiny, and Lord Eldon echoes the same opinion [in Edenborough v. Canterbury (Archbishop)], though he seems, as he sometimes did, to have hesitated very much about it. But he refers to the fact that there are societies and institutions in this country in which for centuries past the mode of election by ballot has been practised, so that it was common enough. Acts of Parliament regulating municipal and parliamentary elections, which have introduced voting by ballot, have at the same time introduced regulations which have freed voting by ballot from the objections which were taken in Faulkner v. Elger.—p. 835.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Tindal, C.J., in Meath (Bishop) v. Winchester (Marquis) said: "It is clearly established that neither the clerk nor ordinary, in that character, could counterplead the plaintiff's title at common law, for neither of them had any interest in the patronage; and under the statute 25 Edw. 3, c. 7, the incumbent (as possessor when presented and instituted) could not counterplead the plaintiff's title without maintaining his own title and that of his patron, on which his own depends." This, I think, must be understood where the quare impedit is brought against the incumbent alone. For it would be strange to hold, where the patron and clerk are co-defendants, and the church is full (the patron, according to the authorities, not being compelled to show any title, or at least being only required to state a pro forma title) that the clerk, who can know nothing about the title, should be put to a proof from which the patron is exempt. The more reasonable view is, that, as it is the patron's right which is in issue, what is a good plea for him is good also for the clerk, who must stand or fall with his patron.—p. 412.

JAMES, V.-C.—Now it is laid down in Knight v. Mosely and Holden v. Weekes that a patron cannot file a bill for an account. I confess that doctrine has always seemed to me to be utterly unintelligible. I could never understand why a vicar who has wrongfully cut timber should not be called to account for the proceeds after he has turned it into money, in order that they may be invested for the benefit of the advowson, it being conceded that the patron is entitled to the specific timber. Here, however, I cannot grant the plaintiff relief without violating any decision, or supposed decision, of that kind, for this timber, though cut, has not been sold.—p. 423.

LORD CAIRNS (for self, ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, LORDS CHELMSFORD and WESTBURY, SIR W. ERLE and SIR J. COLVILLE).—The rule upon this subject has been already laid down by the J.C. in Westerton v. Liddell (and their lordships are disposed entirely to adhere to it): "In the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omissions and no addition can be permitted." The construction of this rubric [the rubric as to ornaments in the commencement of the Prayer Book] was very fully considered by this committee in Westerton v. Liddell already referred to; and the propositions which their lordships understand to have been established by the judgment in that case may thus be stated:—(1) The words "authority of Parliament" in the rubric, refer to and mean the Act of Parliament 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 1, giving parliamentary effect to the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, and do not refer to or mean canons or royal injunctions, having the authority of Parliament, made at an earlier period (Moore, p. 160).

(2) The term "ornaments" in the rubric means those articles, the use of which, in the services and ministrations of the church is prescribed by that Prayer Book (Id. p. 156). (3) The term "ornaments" is confined to those articles (Id. p. 156). (4) Though there may be articles not expressly mentioned in the rubric, the use of which would not be restrained, they must be articles which are consistent with, and subsidiary to, the services: as an organ for the singing, a credence table from which to take the sacramental bread and wine, cushions, hassocks, &c. (Id. p. 187). In these conclusions, and in this construction of the rubric, their lordships entirely concur.—pp. 11—14.

LORD HERSHELL.—It is impossible to read the bishop's statement without seeing that he has honestly considered what appeared to him to be all the circumstances bearing on the question whether proceedings should be allowed to go on. This being so, it is not for your lordships, on this application for a mandamus, to consider whether the bishop's reasons are good or bad; whether they ought or ought not to have led him to form the opinion he did. But I think it only right to say that the meaning of that part of his statement which refers to Phillipotts v. Boyd has, in my opinion, been misconceived by the appellants. That case did, I think, decide that the introduction of a figure of Our Lord in a reredos as part of a decoration was not of itself necessarily and under all circumstances unlawful. And this is, I think, all that the bishop meant to say in the passage which was so much commented on at the Bar.—p. 682.

LORD PENZANCE.—And this is all that was meant to be conveyed by the Court in Peek v. Trower, upon which the learned counsel for the appellants have relied so largely as an authority for the proposition that the consent of the majority in the parish is almost a necessary condition to the grant of the faculty. That case was an application for a faculty to authorise a structural change in the entire body of the church for which no justifiable reason could be offered; it was an alteration which added nothing to the comfort or convenience of the congregation, and which, on the other hand, was fatal to a certain unity of architectural design which was obvious in the structure of the church. The remarks of the Court as to the general desire of the parishioners were in express terms confined to a case like the one then in hand, where the proposed alteration could not be supported on its own merits as an improvement from any point of view. It is the very reverse in the present case.—p. 283.

COLLINS, L.J.—In my judgment churchwardens are not a corporation. They are, as has been said in Withnell v. Gartham, which is a leading case on the matter, qua a corporation for certain purposes, and in the City of London they are only an annual corporation for the purposes of holding lands; but beyond that they are only annual officers, and I think this trust so treats them—p. 393.

WILLES, J. desired to correct an error in the report of Worth v. Terrington, at p. 795. Counsel referring to *Jarratt v. Parke, B. is there reported to have said: "We ought to have higher authority than the decision of Doctors' Commons for that proposition." He [Willess, J.], said he had in his possession a letter from Lord Wensleydale, in which that learned judge declared that he had never made the observation imputed to him. CHITTY, J.—Now it has been decided in Pinder v. Barr that where the vicar was suspended for misconduct by the bishop from performing the duties and receiving the profits of the vicarage, he was not the proper person, and had no authority to appoint a parish clerk, so long as the suspension remained in force. The question there turned upon the construction of the 91st canon, and in that case the Court of Q. B. held that "the minister for the time being" was the curate who had been appointed by the bishop to perform the ecclesiastical duties of the parish, and that the curate was entitled to make the appointment, not by virtue of the bishop's licence, but by virtue of the canon; and that, on the true construction of this canon, inasmuch as the vicar had been suspended from his functions, the term "minister" applied to and included the curate. It follows, therefore, from that case, that if the rector in the present case had been suspended or inhibited, he would have no authority to appoint a parish clerk. But the rector has not been suspended or inhibited, though he has been adjudicated bankrupt, and a sequestration has been issued.—p. 337.

CAIRNS, L.C. (after discussing earlier cases on the words "it shall be lawful," continued): The only other case that I will refer to is Reg. v. Tithe Commissioners. . . In delivering the opinion of the Court, Coleridge, J. uses these words: "The words undoubtedly are only empowering, but it has been so often decided as to have become an axiom, that in public statutes words only directory, permissive, or enabling, may have a compulsory force where the thing to be done is for the public benefit or in advancement of public justice." To the rule thus guardedly expressed there is not, perhaps, much to object, and I only refer to the words for the purpose of pointing out that I am unable to see that they justify the expressions of the L.C.J. of the Queen's Bench in the present case, who speaks of them thus: "Now finding nothing in the enactments or language of the 3rd section or other parts of the Church Discipline Act, which should have the effect of controlling or qualifying the words 'it shall be lawful,' but, on the contrary, finding the language of the section pointing, as it seems to us, the contrary way, we can see no ground which would justify us in giving to those words any other than the meaning which the established canon of construction so thoroughly settled, that Coleridge, J. speaks of it as an axiom—and by which, in construing this statute, we deem ourselves absolutely bound." The only axiom Coleridge, J. spoke of was, that, under certain circumstances, enabling words might have a compulsory force.—p. 224.

[by the Church Discipline Act] whereby the bishop is substituted for the judge, renders the practice which existed at the time when the whole proceedings were in the hands of the judge, a matter of very slender and remote consideration. If it were otherwise, I should not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the judge always had a right and power to refuse to permit his office to be promoted if he thought fit; and that the statements of the law on this subject by Lord Stowell and Sir G. Nicoll, far outweigh the language attributed to Dr. Lushington in the single case of Ditcher v. Dawson. . . . There are numerous dicta on the interpretation of the clause in the Church Discipline Act which is now in controversy: but there has been one decision, and one only, which proceeded upon the proper effect to be given to that clause. I allude to the Bishop of Chester's Case, in which Wightman, J., with, I think, probably the approval of Lord Campbell, decided the case, and acted upon the principle which the C. A. in the present case has affirmed.—p. 229.

BULLER, J.—If that case be understood as establishing this point, that the Ecclesiastical Courts had no jurisdiction to construe the Act of Parliament [5 Edw. 6, c. 3], it cannot be supported, for one of the sections (sect. 3) of the Act expressly gives them jurisdiction. Indeed, it does not appear, from the state of the case in Godbolt, that the Court adverted to the statute; and the ground of that case must have been that it appeared on the face of the libel that the Ecclesiastical Court had no jurisdiction in that particular case.—p. 898.

BAGGALLAY, J.S. :—We have been very much pressed with Salkeld v Johnson, which seems to have had a good deal of influence on the learned judge. I am free to admit there may be certain passages here and there in the nature of obiter dicta which might be said to support the views of the respondents, but we must bear in mind that Salkeld v Johnson had no reference to the city of London, but to a case which undoubtedly, if the circumstances warranted it, was clearly within the provisions of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 100, because it was a claim in respect of tithes, part of which were clearly payable in kind, and part of which were agnate tithes which could hardly be regarded as tithes in kind. As regards that, there does not appear to have been any distinct question raised as to the agnate tithe and the other tithe. That is the distinction between the two cases. One would of course pay the greatest possible respect to anything that fell from Lord Cottenham in this or any other case, whether obiter dicta or necessarily addressed to the decision of the case before him. At the same time we must bear in mind that even Lord Cottenham, although agreeing with the majority of the judges at common law, was differing from the others and from Wigram, V.-C., from whom the case originally came. The opinions of nine judges were one way, the way Lord Cottenham decided, and the opinions of five other judges were the other way. Therefore the case not appearing to be governed by the decision in Salkeld v. Johnson, it does not seem to me that the casual remarks made by Lord Cottenham are sufficient to bind us, although, if I thought they had a distinct bearing on the question now under discussion, I should be disposed to pay the greatest respect and attention to them. There is a strong contrast between the two cases, which is, that that case had no reference to the payment of tithes in the city of London—p. 534.

LORD HERSCHEL :—This House, in Andrews v. Drever, gave their sanction to the rule that mere non-payment of tithes is, even as against a lay non-owner, no evidence to defeat his title, and Lord Eldon held in St. Paul's (Warden) v Kettle that in the case of a claim of this very payment under the statute of Hen. 8 [37 Hen. 8, c. 22], as in the instance of a claim of tithes more strictly, it is not sufficient for the defendant to say against the claim under the statute, as it would not be sufficient against the claim at common law, that the plaintiff never had received the 2s. 8d.—p. 301.

LORD MACNAGHTEN :—Sir W. Grant speaks of the title 'attaching upon' a house.—Antrobus v. East India Co. Lord Eldon speaks of houses as being 'exempt,' and of a house 'paying.' These may be merely convenient and compendious expressions, still they seem to me to show that in the minds of those who used them there was no substantial difference between the occupier paying in respect of the house, and the house itself being charged with the payment. There is, however, one case to which I will call your lordships' attention, where the nature of house tithes in the city of London came under consideration, and the circumstance that the inheritance would be bound or charged by the title formed the ground of decision. Bennet v. Trespass was a case under the Act of Hen. 8. The plaintiff claimed the statutory payment. The defence was that the houses for which it was claimed had paid a less rate before the Act, and that, therefore, according to the true construction of the Act, the defendant was not bound to pay more. Price, B., was in favour of the plaintiff, but the rest of the Court of Ex. directed an issue, and their decision was sustained on appeal to this House—p. 304.

BRAMWELL, B.—It was said that this fee was in truth a burial fee, and not due therefore except by immemorial custom, and that an express contract to pay such a fee was void.

Some of the authorities certainly countenance this view, and especially the passage cited from Gibson's Index, 2nd ed. p. 453. But the current of authorities is the other way. Thus we have the authority of Sir W. Scott in Maidman v. Malpas; Palmer v. Exeter (Bishop), the opinion of Abney, J. in Andriev v. Cudingley (1745) Willes, 637, n. j., and that of Littledale, J. in Blackmore, Ex parte. And the text-writers upon the subject treat these cases as decisive. It may be that upon some occasion these authorities may be successfully questioned. But in the present case there is no appeal from our decision, and we should not, even assuming we disapproved of them—which I am far from saying that we do—be justified in running counter to them—p. 217.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Therefore the case does not seem to come within the authority of Ashby v. Harris, when it was held that the grant must be taken under the circumstances to imply a right to keep in order and renew the plants which had been originally permitted to be planted as part of the monument erected under the terms of the grant. I think that decision goes rather far, but it does not seem to me to be in point. This is not a question of the right to keep in repair and maintain that which must be taken to have been erected under the grant—p 827

BOWER, L.J.—The erection of monuments in the churchyard in the ordinary course is a matter of habitual practice, but as a matter of law, strictly speaking, the consent of the ordinary would seem to be a necessary condition of the legality of their erection, and, therefore, what Lord Coke says [3 Inst 202], as to the erection of monuments to the deceased in church or churchyard in a convenient manner being lawful, must be taken subject to the reservation pointed out by Lord Stowell in Maidman v Malpas (supra, col 958), viz., that the convenience of the erection is to be judged of by the ordinary.

It was argued that in Ashby v Harris it was decided that the right to place flowers or plant shrubs over the grave was incidental to the right of burial. As to that I say nothing, for it does not appear to me to touch this case—pp 828, 829.

BRETT, M.R.—I cannot see that any of the cases which have been cited are at all in conflict with the decision we now come to, notwithstanding some expressions in the judgment of Blackburn, J in Reg. v Walcott St Swithun Overseers, which seem to be in favour of the view that a double burial board might be absurd, and some expressions of Crompton, J in that case seem to show a doubt in his mind whether they might not be unjust. But I cannot see the absurdity or injustice—p 843.

KELLY, C.B.—It appears to me clear from Ive v. Scott, that the judgment is not evidence of the defendant's possession at all. There, it is true, the judgment by default immediately in question was in the action for mere profits itself. It was therefore unnecessary in that action to offer any evidence of the mere fact of actual possession at some time. The only dispute had been before the under-sheriff on a writ of inquiry as to the amount of damages. The under-sheriff had directed a verdict for nominal damages only, and the point decided was, that the defendants by suffering judgment by default in the action of trespass, had not admitted the days in the declaration during which he was alleged to have been in possession. The verdict, therefore, stood—a rule to set it aside being refused. The importance of the case arises from the fact that the verdict, for nominal damages only, was not disturbed. Now, if the judgment in the action of ejectment, which must have been produced to prove the other part of the case, had been held to be evidence of the defendant's possession at the date of the writ, the under-sheriff's ruling must have been wrong, because the plaintiff would then have been entitled to the value of the premises from the time of the commencement of the action of ejectment, to the time when he obtained re-possession, i.e., to something more than nominal damages; and the under-sheriff can only have been held to be right on the ground that proof of actual possession from that time was necessary, and that it had not been supplied. Therefore, notwithstanding any presumptions of law which ought to be made with regard to the regularity of the proceedings in ejectment, the plaintiffs, in my opinion, were, so far as the case depends on the judgment in the ejectment, without evidence of actual possession by the defendant at any time, and had no other evidence been adduced, would not be entitled to recover a verdict.—

[CHANNELL and CLARKE, B.B., considered that judgment by default in the ejectment was probatum facit evidence of the possession of the defendant at the date of the writ, though not from any period anterior to it.]

KAY, J.—That case (Hearle v. Greenbank) was followed by Rich v. Cockell, which is not a very distinct authority; but Mr. Jarman, at p. 419 of the 3rd edition (4th ed. p. 446) of his book, says "In order to raise a case of election, there must be a personal competency on the part of the author of the attempted disposition, as the doctrine is founded on intention which supposes such competency. Thus, under the old law, where personality was, and real estate was not, disposable by the will of a person under age, the heir of the infant testator was allowed to take his real estate in opposition to the will, without relinquishing a legacy bequeathed to him by the same will. And though the disability of coverture is, in some respects, distinguishable from less absolute than that of infancy (a few coverture having, it is said, a disposing mind, but not a disposing power, while an infant has neither one nor the other), yet the principle seems, according to the authorities, to apply to the attempted dispositions of married women. If, therefore, a few coverture, having a testamentary power, makes an appointment by will in favour of her husband, and by the same will professes to bequeath to another personal estate to which her power does not extend, the husband may take the benefit appointed to him, and also defeat the intended bequest of the other property, by the assertion of his marital right. And he refers to Rick v. Cockrell in support of that proposition. Now, whether Rick v. Cockrell is a satisfactory and absolute decision or not, I find this statement, in a work of such high authority, to be the result of that case coupled with Heavie v. Greenbank, and seeing that there has since been no authority dissenting from it, I certainly do not feel strong enough to decide the other way.—p. 48.

[Contention is—that, when a person in his will says, "all my estates which I shall be possessed of," it is the same thing as if he had said, "all my estates, which being now mine, shall be mine till my decease;" in other words, "all that estate on which my will can operate"]

BROGHAM, L.C.—I must admit that Back v. Kett goes a certain way in support of that position; nor can I altogether reconcile the judgment there given with the prior case of Thellusson v. Woodford, which, if Back v. Kett be to stand as law, is certainly considerably broken in upon by the decision of Sir T. Plumer, Thellusson v. Woodford is referred to by his honour in terms of considerable doubt and hesitation, in a manner clearly showing, that, had it originally fallen to him to decide, he would have come to a different conclusion. Nevertheless, Thellusson v. Woodford is a case of the highest authority. . . . I cannot see the least foundation for the doubt attempted to be cast upon that case; and although, perhaps, Thellusson v. Woodford is not in necessary contrast with Back v. Kett, . . . certainly the doctrine laid down in that case is inconsistent with Back v. Kett, and with the argument urged at the bar in support of this appeal.—p. 238.

between certain benefits derived under a will for her separate use without any restraint on anticipation, and the life interest to her separate use without power of anticipation given to her under a settlement executed when she was an infant; and the decision in this case was stated without any expression of disapproval by Lord Selborne in Codrington v. Lindsay (supra). On the other hand, the late M.R., Sir G. Jessel, in Smith v.
Lucas (supra), criticised the decision of Lord Hatherley in Willoughby v. Middleton, and observed forcibly on the inconveniences which would follow if that decision were to prevail; and this case before the M.R. was referred to without disapproval by Lord Selborne in the H. L. in Child v. Child [(1883) 8 App. Cas. 420, 427. See "HUSBAND AND WIFE"]—Chitty, J. in Wheatley, In re, has followed the late M.R. whilst Kay, J. has in the case now under appeal followed Lord Hatherley. In this conflict of opinion in the Courts of first instance, and, in the absence of any decision in the H. L. or in this Court, we find ourselves at liberty, and therefore bound to decide the question before us upon principle. Upon principle, we are of opinion, for the reasons already given, that the order of Kay, J. cannot be sustained, and we discharge the same, and declare that the appellant is not bound to elect—p. 281.

CHITTY, J.—The case is not fairly distinguishable from that before V.-C. Wood, afterwards Lord Hatherley, in Willoughby v. Middleton, where the V.-C. held that a married woman who had by a marriage settlement executed by her when a minor, covenanted to settle after-acquired property, was bound to either bring into the settlement a separate legacy for her separate use or to make compensation out of property to which she was entitled under the settlement to her separate use without power of anticipation. The authority of that case has not been overruled. It was disapproved of by Jessel, M.R. in Smith v. Lucas (supra), and the principle upon which it proceeded was questioned by James, L.J. in Tuscan v. Tuscan [(1878) 47 L. J. Ch. 849, 9 Ch. D. 869, at p. 875. See "PORTION"]. It was not disapproved of by either Lord Selborne or Lord Cairns in Codrington v. Codrington, Codrington v. Lendary (supra), a case in which there was restraint on anticipation. But although Willoughby v. Middleton was not disapproved of by either of those learned judges, yet they both carefully examined the provisions of the settlement in Codrington v. Codrington, and such examination was apparently unnecessary if they had been simply adopting the decision in Willoughby v. Middleton. The strange result of the application of the doctrine of election and its consequences to a case where a married woman takes an interest under the settlement vested in her maliculously, is that it enables her in the result to deprive herself of the provision thus made for her. To take the case of a father settling an maliculous provision for his daughter, an infant at the time of her marriage, if the settlement contains what purports to be a covenant on her part, by which, however, she is not bound. Some one else, by bequeathing to her property for her separate use, enables her to deprive herself of what her father intended should be an maliculous provision. In my opinion that consequence of his decision escaped the attention of Lord Hatherley. . . . But whatever may be my own opinion on the subject I consider that I am bound by Lord Hatherley's decision, and consequently I must make a declaration to the effect that the petitioner is bound to make compensation out of her life interest—p. 791.

WICKENS, v.c.—It is perhaps too broadly stated by Lord Thurlow in Buttricks v Broadhurst, whose dictum has been adopted by Mr. Swanson in the note to Dillon v Parker, and other text writers, that the Court of Ch. will in all cases entertain a suit by a person put to election to ascertain the value of the objects between which election is to be made. No doubt there is in almost all cases jurisdiction in equity to compel a final election, so as to quiet the title of those interested in the objects of which one is to be chosen, and the Court, as a condition of compelling such a final election, secures to the person compelled to make it, all the information necessary to guide him in doing so. It is also generally, though not perhaps universally true, that a person for whose benefit conditions will be imposed by the Court, before it makes an order against him, can entitle himself to the benefit of the conditions by filing a bill, and offering by it to submit to the order.—p. 85

ROMILLY, M.R.—In Carver v Bowles Sir J. Leach held that no case of election arose; but the applicability of that case to others is supposed to be much impaired, unless the appointment be made in exactly the words to be found in that case. Accordingly, it seems to have been held . . . in Moriarty v Martin (indeed it is stated in Mr Jarman's work), that the decision in Carver v Bowles turned exclusively on the words which introduced the appointment by the testator, viz., "so far as I lawfully or equitably may or can order or appoint." I have considered this attentively, but . . . I am unable to see how the question of election can properly depend upon the testator expressing a doubt whether the disposition he desired to make was a legal and effective one. . . . I have, as carefully as I could, reconsidered my decision in Blackett v Lamb (supra). I have also read and considered Moriarty v Martin, and I must say that the result of so doing has induced me to concur with the observations made upon that case by Brady, L.C. in King v King (supra). I think that a very dangerous rule of construction would be introduced, and one which would lead to great difficulties and technicalities, if the Court were to hold that the construction of identically the same words in a will would be different if the testator in one case prefaced these words by saying that he made the bequest as far as he lawfully could or might, and omitted that preface in the other. It appears to me that these words are implied in every gift that a testator makes, and in consequence of them, to alter the person who is to take and raise a case of election, by introducing into the gift of the residue a condition that the residuary legatee shall not take it unless she gives effect to a prior invalid appointment, seems to me an absurdity in construction. To make the efficacy of such a charge depend upon the mere expression of a doubt in the testator's mind, as to the legality or invalidity of what he is attempting to do, would, in my opinion, in the construction of wills, be productive of great difficulty, and lead to much litigation. The object of all judicial decisions ought to be to simplify these rules as much as possible, and when a man by will executes a power vested in him by a prior instrument, it is to be assumed that he intends to execute that power legally, and only so far as he can do so legally, and the expression in the will that such is his intention ought not, in my opinion, to vary the effect of it. Take the converse case—suppose the testator had expressly said, "I know that legally I cannot so exercise the power, but still I choose to do it," could the Court, on such a statement, engraft a condition, compelling the legatee, who also took other benefits under the will, to give effect to that invalid appointment, or abandon the other gifts? That would be a much stronger case than that suggested in Mortuary v. Martin, but I know of no case that is to that effect, or, indeed, proceeds upon any ground of that description, with the exception of the construction put on Carver v. Bowles in Mortuary v. Martin. That case seems to me to stand alone; all the other authorities are against raising the question of election in such a case, and this is confirmed by Woodbridge v. Woodbridge (supra), which is in every material particular the same as the case before me, and where the V-C lays down the same principle.—p. 96.

James, when V-C, in Wollaston v. King (supra), in these terms, adopting the words of the judgment in Whistler v. Webster (supra, col. 962), that no man shall claim any benefit under a will without conforming, as far as he is able, and giving effect to everything contained in it, whereby any disposition is made showing an intention that such a thing should take place. But there is a class of cases which at first sight appear to be in conflict with the generality of that rule. That class of authorities consists of Carver v. Bowles, Woodbridge v. Woodbridge, and other cases of the same description, including . . . Wollaston v. King . . . In those cases the testator had exceeded the power vested in him by directing that certain property which he had in the first place appointed absolutely to an object of the power, should be held upon trusts or subject to conditions in favour of persons who were not objects of the power, but who would probably be objects of any settlement or provision which might be made by the appointee . . . The conclusion which the Court arrived at was, that as there was an absolute gift to the object of the power, that must prevail, and the modifications which were not valid in law must be rejected, and the moment the Court arrived at that conclusion it was apparent that no case of election arose, because the object of the power was the only person who takes, and there is no conflict between him and a person who is not an object of it. Therefore in those cases the whole question as to election fell to the ground.—p. 559.

CAIRNS, L.C.—The general rule of the Court on this subject is expressed by Lord Talbot in Streetfield v. Streetfield (supra, col. 962), and by Lord Keeper Cowper in Nags v. Mordaunt (supra, col. 862). Lord Talbot says: "When a man takes upon him to devise what he had no power over under a supposition that his will will be acquiesced under, the Court compels the devisee, if he will take advantage of the will, to take entirely but not partially under it, as was done in Nags v. Mordaunt, there being a tacit condition annexed to all devises of this nature, that the devisee do not disturb the disposition which the deviser hath made." And Lord Keeper Cowper says, in Nags v. Mordaunt: "In all cases of this kind, where a man is disposing of his estate among his children, and gives to one fee simple lands, and to another lands entailed or under settlement, it is upon an implied condition that each party acquit and relieve the other."—p. 10.

LORD HATHERLEY, who concurred, said: I apprehend that the difficulty which has been supposed to exist in this case arises in a great measure from something which has been thrown out in other cases, and notably in . . . Cavan (Lady) v. Pulteney, with reference to the non-application of the doctrine of election to what in that case was called a derivative interest. But the derivative interest in that case was simply this—A lady having been put to her election the question was whether her husband who was tenant by courtesy under her election in the estate which she elected to take was again to be put to his election in respect of an interest which he took under the will, and which those who argued for the election said he ought not to be allowed to benefit by, unless he gave up his interest as tenant by the courtesy.—p. 15.

LORD O'HAGAN, who also concurred, said: It was also put as a distinction, and pressed upon the House, that the derivative character of the property here made a difference. I have been unable to see a distinction between the derivative character of property which comes to the heir by reason of the law, just as much as it comes to the next of kin by reason of the law, and the derivative character of property which comes by devise. I see no such distinction, and I think that when the authorities are looked to it will be seen that, as in Grissell v. Swinhoe, if the property devolves after the death of the testator on testatrix, whether it be by heirship or by devise, then the derivative character becomes material to the case. But, under the circumstances of this case, we have a property to be ascertained, which was vested in these appellants before the death of the testatrix, and therefore this case is wholly different from Grissell v. Swinhoe, and from any other case that can be cited—p. 16.

LORD MONCRIEFF, in concurring, said. In Grissell v. Swinhoe, . . . the distinction was quite clearly brought out between the double right to take under the will, and to defeat part of its provisions emerging when the will comes into operation, and a subsequent succession to or acquisition of some right which would have that effect after the legacy, or the benefits bestowed by the will, had become unconditionally and fully vested. That is quite a different case. I do not say what the law applicable to it may be.—p. 17.

CHITTY, J.—In that case [Wilson v. Townsend (Lord)] the election was to take against the instrument, and the bill was dismissed. The observations relied on are, at the utmost, mere dicta, and they are not even dicta in favour of compensation where the election is to take under the instrument, but of forfeiture. At the time when that decision was given, it had not been finally decided that election to take against the instrument did not involve forfeiture, but merely gave a right to compensation out of the interest given by the instrument. The dictum relied on is—“If the party is under restraint, and cannot accomplish that” (viz., give up the specific thing to which he has a paramount title), “it is the misfortune of the party, but the consequence is, that while he continues in that situation, his claim must be barred.” This, apparently, points to personal incapacity and certainly involves forfeiture. The dictum cannot be supported as it stands.

That case [Williams v. Mayne] is distinguishable from the present. It was admitted that a case of election arose and that the married woman was bound to give up her interest in the fund if she accepted the legacy, and it was considered that she would be capable of binding her interest in the fund when it fell into possession. The question then resolved itself into this, whether she was bound to elect while her interest under the settlement was reversionary, or whether the time for electing ought not to be postponed until she could bind her interest under the settlement—pp. 175–176.

BAGGALLAY, L. J.—There could be no possible doubt as to the application of the principles laid down in Bradley v. Baylis but for certain remarks made by Brett, L. J. ["supposing during the qualifying year one of these lodgers leaves, and the owner thereupon, as he assuredly must, resumes the control over that unit part, according to my view of the statute, immediately by that act of his those people left in the house, who had been householders, became lodgers again" (the words in italics do not appear in the Law Journal reports)] of which a view has been taken which was never contemplated by the Lord Justice at the time. No doubt the language used by his lordship would at first sight bear the construction which has been sought to be put upon it by the appellant, but I cannot think that such a case as the present was contemplated by his lordship. I think that by resuming control over that portion which had been previously let was meant assuming complete control over it, as if the landlord had continued to reside in the house during the qualifying year. That certainly would be the view I should draw from the observations of the Master of the Rolls as to the consideration what might or might not constitute a lodger. I think that the Court did not intend to give anything like an exhaustive definition of those who occupy as lodgers as distinguished from those who occupy other than as lodgers. But it was there indicated that regard must be had to the particular circumstances of each case and to the cases decided previously. I feel bound to go further and say, that if Brett, L. J. intended to use the language in the sense contended for, I must respectfully dissent from him. It was no portion of his judgment, and was only in the form of an illustration.—p. 108.

LORD RUSSELL, C. J.—It was argued on behalf of the appellant that this case was concluded by Stribling v. Halse. I cannot assent to that view, while recognising that we ought to be bound by that case so far as it extends. In that case each shop assistant had a separate furnished bedroom structurally completely separate as a room, and no one person in his occupation of his particular bedroom shared light, air, warmth or ventilation with any other room. It is stated in the judgment in Stribling v. Halse that a doubt which had been expressed by the present M. R. when L. J. was removed by a decision of the Court of Appeal; but there is no reported case to this effect, and a rigorous search made at my instance has failed to discover any record of such a case. The doubt there referred to was whether a person could be said to separately occupy a bedroom as a dwelling-house where he dwelt partly in the bedroom and partly in other rooms. I share this doubt, especially in a case in which other rooms, for meals, and other purposes, are shared in common. I should nowhere have referred to this doubt, but for the facts—first, that the case which is said to have removed this doubt cannot be found, and, secondly, because in the Irish case of Hasson v. Chambers (18 Ir. L. R. 68) two of the five learned judges in the Court of Appeal expressly dissented from Stribling v. Halse, and the majority, while acquiescing in it, can hardly be said to have approved of it. Nor, in my opinion, is the doubt referred to removed by the 5th section of the 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26—pp. 410, 411.

BRETT, J.—Cook v. Humber (supra) has been supposed to have overruled *Toms v. BRETT, J. (for the Court).—In that case, Abel, the appellant, claimed, in 1870, to be placed on the register under sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867. It was conceded that he was duly qualified in all other respects, but it was objected that he was disqualified by reason of not having paid a rate made in respect of the qualifying premises on the 18th of June, 1869, made, therefore, before the commencement of the qualifying year. The answer relied on to this objection was, that, after October, 1869, that is to say, during the qualifying year, the payment of this rate was duly excused. The revising barrister disallowed the vote. It was argued on the appeal that the only rates which it was necessary that the proposed voter should have paid were those made and allowed within the qualifying year, and that the excusal by magistrates, whenever made, from payment of any rate, relieved the proposed voter from the obligation, as matter of qualification, of having paid such rate. Both of these arguments were overruled by the Court on the ground of the difference of the words used in the sub-sect. of sect. 3, and on the largeness of the words used in sub-sect. 4. Inasmuch as the rate in question, viz. that of June, 1869, was made after the 5th of January of the year preceding the qualifying year, the question under discussion in the present case was not raised in that case. The expressions of the judges were pointed to the argument that payment was only required of the rates made within the qualifying year. In that case it was necessary to point out the largeness of the words used in sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867; in this case it has been necessary to consider how far that largeness required limitation—p. 240.

BRETT, J.—The only decision which raises any difficulty in my mind is Re v. Mitchell. But that arose upon different words from those which govern the present case. Here the question is, whether under sect. 32 of the Reform Act there has been a sufficient residence. There, the question was, whether there was a right to vote as an inhabitant under a charter. As I understand that case, it was held that, on the proper construction of the charter, a person might be an inhabitant without dwelling in the borough. Inasmuch as he had his house and establishment there, and his family, it was considered that he was what would be generally meant by an inhabitant, and would be commonly called so, and so was within the meaning of the charter. It does not appear to me that that case can govern the construction of the Act we are now considering.—p 276

case to contend that we are not bound by what has been treated as the law ever since the year 1846, viz., that the possession of a rent-charge, to satisfy the Reform Act, must be a possession in fact. The question afterwards arose in a different form. In Heelis v. Blain, a new view of the matter was suggested, viz., that when the grant of the rent charge did not take effect at common law, but by the Statute of Uses (27 Hen. 8, c. 10), the statute executed the use in possession; and so the grantee became at once in actual possession. The case was argued entirely upon that footing. The rent-charge there undoubtedly came within the statute, and it was held that the person to whose use the grantee was seized was, by the effect of the Statute of Uses, to be deemed to be in possession of the rent-charge so as to satisfy the words "actual possession" in sect. 26 of the Reform Act. So far from dissenting from the previous cases of Murray v. Thornley and Hayden v. Tiverton, the Court expressly adopt them, and hold that the possession to satisfy sect. 26 must be an actual possession, but they came to the conclusion that the claimant in the case then before them was to be deemed to have been in such actual possession by the operation of the Statute of Uses.—p 295

BOVILL, C.J.—[The learned judge stated the facts of the above three cases (see p. 298).] It was contended before us that Robinson v. Dunkley was at variance with the two previous decisions, and virtually overruled them. It is difficult to reconcile those decisions, and still more difficult to distinguish the present case in principle from Robinson v. Dunkley. The question is certainly involved in much doubt also, but for the decision in the last case, I should have had no hesitation in adding, as the reviving barister has done in this case, upon the authority of Copland v. Bartlett and Beamish v. Stoke, and upon the reasons of the very learned and eminent judges who decided those cases. The later case, however, of Robinson v Dunblay having been decided, I think it is better to abide by that decision. There are also strong arguments in support of it.—p. 300.

CAVE, J. (delivering the judgment of the Court).—The case of Baxter v Brown was relied on. That case has been sometimes doubted and sometimes distinguished. If the Court there meant to lay down the principle that members of an association cannot by agreement among themselves divest themselves of any equitable interest in lands purchased for the purposes of the association, and cannot vest those lands in trustees free from such equitable interest, that case is opposed to a cloud of authorities, and is not law. If, however, the Court there only meant to decide that in that case the parties had not agreed to divest themselves of their equitable interests, the case is distinguishable. In the case now under consideration it is clear that the members meant to vest the freeholds in the trustees free from any equitable interest in the individual members in the land itself, and to give to the members of the association an interest in the profits of the concern only. There is nothing contrary to law in such an arrangement, but one consequence of it is that the individual members have no equitable interest in the freeholds vested in the trustees, and consequently the decision of the revising barrister was correct and must be affirmed.—p. 35.

HAWKINS, J.—In Harrison v. Carter the lands forming the charity estate were devised to and vested in trustees—persons other than the claiming voter. Here they are vested in the brethren themselves, and the brethren, so long as they are such, live in houses of which they are for the time legal owners, and, though their right to occupy is dependent on the will of the trustees, the power of removal has never yet been exercised. Again, here the funds are to be distributed to feeble, old, or necessitous persons—necessitous not necessarily meaning persons in extreme poverty. In Harrison v. Carter they were to be shared by the poorer inhabitants, and the particular voter whose vote was questioned was so needy as that (the money being distributed according to actual necessity) he was awarded the largest amount distributed to any one family. There was also this further fact in Harrison v. Carter, that before 1867 the person who was removed from the register had never been in a condition to claim a vote, the house he occupied being of insufficient value, whereas in the present case the claimant had with his predecessors, for a longer period than 1892, been uninterruptedly allowed to vote in respect of the same qualification until 1896. In Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth poverty and inability to maintain themselves by their own exertions were found as the condition of the claimants to vote, and each occupant of an almshouse was required to wear a badge, and it was not suggested that any occupant had any freehold interest in the house he occupied. Following these two cases, Edwards v. Lloyd and Doe v. Kent might also be cited as supporting to some extent the objection of the respondent. Those cases, however, are distinguishable in their material facts from that now before us. . . . On the other hand Smith v. Hall strongly supports the case of the appellant to have his name upon the register.

CAVE, J.—Another case is cited by the revising barrister, that of Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth, to the decision of which I was myself a party. That case is not to be found in the regular reports, and I feel some difficulty about it. If it merely follows Harrison v. Carter, it is unnecessary to consider it, but if it is to be taken as dissenting from Harison v Carter, and as laying down that a person though legally entitled to participate in such funds is not entitled to vote, then I think it is wrong

LINDLEY, M. R.—The objector did not put in the notice his place of abode, which was out of London, but he inserted his business address, which was within the borough. . . . The revising barrister has found as a fact that no one was misled by what was done, and he amended the notice by putting in the real place of abode of the objector. The question is whether he had power to do this. . . . In Bridges v. Miller the Court held that there was no power to amend so as to turn what was really a bad objection into a good one. That is an intelligible decision, but it does not apply in the present case. Smith v. Chandler was a case of a notice of claim by a lodger claimant which was bad. Whether it could have been amended I do not know, because I have not sufficiently examined the provisions as to lodger votes. But the ratio decidendi was that there was a rival form intentionally used by the agents who would not use the parliamentary form, and that which they used was clearly bad. Here there is a good objection, and, if the objector had given his right address, one to which the revising barrister must have given weight. I entertain no doubt that in this case there was power to amend, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Notice of Objections.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—According to the authority of Sheldon v. Fletcher, and according to good sense, I think that the objectors' places of abode were sufficiently described. The decision in Sheldon v. Fletcher seems to me to be directly in point. We have been pressed with Humphrey v. Earle, but the distinction between that case and the present is that there there was no finding that the persons objected to had not been misled, and the Court seem to have thought that the omission of the word "the" before "churchyard" might have misled them into supposing that the address did not refer to the churchyard in Petersfield, whereas here the revising barrister has found, as a fact, that no one has been misled or inconvenienced by the omission.

ERLE, C.J.—We are to assume that the Legislature has a reasonable intention, and when the words of the Act are not express we are to interpret them as to give effect to those intentions. It was on this ground that the Court held that the place of abode of the objector was essential, and that the year should be given in the date, as inconvenience might arise to the person objected to by their omission. I cannot see that it can make the smallest difference to any one whether the day of the date coincides with the day on which the signature is actually written or not. Such being the ground of the English decisions, the question came before the Irish Court in the case of Parkinson v. Brophy. There is no body of judicial men for whom I have a higher respect than the Irish judges, but I do not think that the Act so clearly requires the exact day of the signature to be inserted as the majority of the judges in that case thought it did, and we must therefore look to the purpose of the Act, and I agree with Hayes, J., and think that the present case is distinguished from those previously decided by the fact that it can be of no importance to any one whether the date contains the exact day of the signature of the notice or not, and I am of opinion, therefore, that it is not necessary that it should do so—p. 143.

LOPES, L.J.—Childs v. Cox was, in my judgment, wrongly decided and ought to be reversed. The Court there says that the case shows that on August 20th no "ordinary course of post" existed; but that is not so. There was an "ordinary course of post," by which the notices would have been delivered in time, if nothing had been done to intercept them.

WILLES, J.—The cases of Bartlett v. Gibbs and Onions v. Bowdler must be taken in connection with the decision in Flounders v. Donnor (2 C. B. 63, see col. 984) and Hitchins v. Brown (2 C. B. 25). In Flounders v. Donnor, Eric, J. seems to have been of opinion that, if the number had been supplied, the barrister would have been bound to amend. Both the cases of Bartlett v. Gibbs and Onions v. Bowdler are cases in which the character of the qualification would have been changed by the amendment because the claim was in respect of the occupation of one house, whereas the real qualification was in respect of the occupation of two houses. In the one case there was no reference at all to the first house, in the other, no reference to the second. The real qualification was totally different from that described.—p. 168

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In Foskett v. Kaufman the Court of Appeal virtually decided that where such a declaration has been made the revising barrister has power to make an alteration in the description of the qualification, which he could not otherwise have made. . . . It is true that in Lord v. Fox, where the voter had made a declaration, a Divisional Court . . . held that the revising barrister had no power to alter the description of the qualification. In that case, however, the important fact that a declaration had been made was not prominently brought to the attention of the Court. If the decision in that case conflict, with the view I have expressed, it seems inconsistent with the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Foskett v. Kaufman. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J. (for the Court).—We are aware that in so applying the principles we have deduced from the statute, we are acting apparently in opposition to some of the decisions in *The Wigton Case (Roswell v. HAWKINS, J. (for the Court).—It is not necessary for the decision of the present case for us to determine whether or not it is the duty of the presiding officer to look at the ballot paper of a voter, and see that it is marked with the official mark before it is placed in the box; nor what course he should pursue if a voter attempted to put in the ballot box a voting paper which is obviously without an official mark. This is a matter upon which the judges of the Court of Common Pleas were equally divided in the case of Pickering v. James, Bovill, C.J. and Grove, J., entertaining the opinion that no such duty is cast upon the presiding officer, Keating and Brett, J.J. entertaining the opposite view. We think it right, however, to say that we adopt the latter view, which certainly is most in accordance with what seems to us to have been the intention of the legislature.—p. 751.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—[should yield implicit deference to that great authority, Willes, J., if it were in point in the present case; in my opinion, however, it clearly is not. It is true that the Guildford Petition was a case of a claim of a scrutiny, but the petitioner further asked that, if in the course of the scrutiny anything would have invalidated the election, then the election should be invalidated, although the claim of the petitioner was for a scrutiny only. Under those circumstances, Willes, J. thought that the petition contained matter which brought it within the operation of rule 6 as well as of rule 7. I need do no more than say that the facts of the present case are wholly different [the part of the petition in question simply claiming the seat and not that the election should be invalidated].

POLLOCK, B.—It is clear that the case of Howford (Leatham v. Barber), a small borough, which would be kept in a state of ferment until the trial of the petition was over, affords but a very slender analogy to the present case. Stepany is a large and populous division, and there is no reason to suppose that it would be greatly disturbed by the proceedings in connection with the petition. It is essential that time should be allowed the respondent to get up his case, and, if this were an isolated case, I cannot doubt that ten days would not be longer than would be reasonably necessary —p. 120.

WILLS, J.—In the case referred to the occupation was admitted to be occupation by virtue of service. Here the labourers were not required to reside in the cottages, but were allowed to reside in them as a privilege. It would be an abuse of language to call residence under such conditions occupation by virtue of service.

LORD HENSHILL.—I quite agree . . . that it is not necessary on the present occasion to come to any conclusion as to whether that case was rightly decided, or whether if rightly decided it is applicable, having regard to the altered legislation with which we have to deal. But it seems to me that, so far as regards the question whether an alderman is capable of standing as a candidate for the office of councillor, the case of Reg. v. Coaks was not a considered decision of the Court of Q. B. According to the report of the case to which our attention has been called,
it was assumed, and was necessarily assumed, that the candidate was ineligible because it had been so determined in another proceeding, as I understand, with reference to the particular case and the particular individual. The decision, therefore, if it be a decision of the Court of Q. B.
with regard to the eligibility or non-eligibility of an alderman, was pronounced in an earlier case of which no report appears to be forthcoming except one contained in the local papers of the period, and, so far as we have learned from the information which has been afforded to us, the case really was not argued there, because the learned counsel who appeared to contend in favour of the eligibility of the alderman intimated that they should have great difficulty in doing so, and practically abandoned the case, upon which of course the decision followed against them—pp 321, 322.

WRIGHT, J. (for self and BRUCE, J.).—We are unable to discover any material difference between the language of the Acts on which Monks v. Jackson was decided and the language of the Act of 1882, on which this case depends; and although the considerations which have led us to a conclusion in favour of the present petitioner's right to maintain his petition were not presented to the Court in Monks v. Jackson, we ought to follow the decision in that case if it can be supported since the Bangor Case (see per Lord Herschell at p. 257), and if it is in point. We think, though not without doubt, that it is not in point. The decision was that the petitioners had not been nominated in fact, and therefore were not qualified to petition. Here the petitioner was duly nominated in fact. His nomination was in form regular, and he was therefore a candidate, and in our opinion qualified to maintain this petition—not, of course, for the purpose of claiming the seat, but for the purpose of showing that there was no valid election, as any of the persons who voted at the election might have done, whether they had a right to vote or not. Our decision does not involve the proposition that in every case a person whose nomination has been rejected on the ground of disqualification or want of qualification can maintain a petition. We do not understand it to be laid down in the Bangor Case that a nomination cannot ever be rejected except for informality in the form or presentation of it. If the nomination paper is on the face of it a mere abuse of the right of nomination, or an obvious unreality, as, for instance if it purported to nominate a woman or a deceased sovereign, there can be no doubt that it ought to be rejected, and no petition could be maintained in respect of its rejection.—p. 603.

SMITH, L.J.—Harmon v. Park was decided upon an Act which enacted that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas should be final when it gave its decision upon a special case, and it was therein held that there was an appeal upon a decision upon an interlocutory matter not raised by special case, but this decision was before the Act of 1881, which makes the decision of the Divisional Court final upon questions of law, no matter how raised, unless special leave to appeal be given. The cases of Line v. Warren (ante, referred to, which is "In apportioning the lessor of the plaintiff claimed as heir by descent, and showed the death of his elder brothers, but not that they died without issue—Curia, this must likewise be proved." That may be taken to be right, it being a matter reasonably within the capability of proof by the plaintiff, not being without the time of living memory, and the persons who were dead being his elder brothers only. I should, with all respect, therefore say that what the Court said so far was right, for it was a thing which the plaintiff could prove, and if he does not prove it, the jury would say they were not satisfied that he is the heir. So in this particular case negative evidence as to the more recent relatives is necessary, and that has been given. The note goes on to say, "The plaintiff must remove every possibility of title in another person." But that cannot possibly be correct. There must be some inaccuracy, for all the plaintiff can be called upon to do is to give evidence to show that it is improbable there are any preferable descendants. With respect to this note, which is very short, I must say that I differ from it, except as to the first part of it.—p. 293 AMPHLETT, B. concurred

PEARSON, J.—Mandeville's Case was discussed by Kindersley, V.-C., in Wright v Vernon. In delivering judgment the V.-C. says: "I do not propose to discuss the merits of the original decision, though perhaps it might not be very difficult to show that the exigency of the statute De Donis, which presumptively directed that the will of the donor should always for the future be observed, left no alternative but to decide Mandeville's Case as it was decided, inasmuch as, when the estate was limited to the heirs special of a particular ancestor without any estate of freehold limited to the ancestor himself (either expressly or by implication), it was impossible to effectuate that expressed will of the donor and to make the estate pass through the whole series of heirs designated, except by regarding the limitation as if it were an estate tail which had originally vested in, and had descended from, the ancestor himself, and yet the first taker must take as purchaser, because no estate did in fact vest in or descend from the ancestor. Obedience to the positive injunction of the statute De Donis appears to have necessitated the creation of this anomalous kind of entail which Lord Hale fitly terms
 a quasi entail, partaking of the opposite qualities of purchase and descent." Then he said that Mandeville's Case had been recognised as law and followed for at least five centuries, and he declined to depart from it. But Mandeville's Case and the statute De Donis related to an estate limited to special heirs, and not to an ordinary estate in fee; and you cannot by any process of reasoning apply the rule there laid down to an ordinary case in which the limitation is, not to heirs special, but to heirs general.—p. 306.

NORTH, J.—[The decision in Allhusen v. Whittell does not furnish me with much assistance in the present case, for it was based on the principle that the tenant for life of the residue of a testator's estate is not tenant for life of the whole estate, but of the whole estate minus something, and that something must be ascertained before it can be said of what he is tenant for life. He is not tenant for life of the whole estate, and he is not entitled to receive the whole income, and the rule in Allhusen v. Whittell was adopted as a convenient and fair rule—for ascertaining the share of the estate which really represented residue, and of which the tenant for life was entitled to receive the income, as distinguished from the entire estate. The rule, in my opinion, does not apply to a case like the present.—p. 172.

KIRKWHICH, J.—[The judgment of Wood, V.-C. in Allhusen v. Whittell has from its date been regarded as establishing the rule applicable to such circumstances as there occurred. The only point in which it approaches the present case is that respecting contingent legacies, and all that the V.-C. did as regards them was to hold that, although a proper amount must be set apart to meet contingent legacies when payable, the tenant for life of the residue out of which those legacies would ultimately be taken was entitled to the income of the fund set apart until required for that purpose.—Harrison,
In re, before North, J., is really only another example of the application of the same principle.
I do not quite understand what the learned judge means by saying that he did not think the tenant for life entitled to have the estate sold by his bid, but he certainly did not intend that the tenant for life should not have a real charge with all its incidents. In this instance, also, in my endeavour to make sure what was intended and done, I sent for the order, but it has never yet been drawn up. The registrar's note informed me that counsel was to prepare minutes.
I therefore communicated with the counsel, and he has been good enough for my benefit to communicate with his clients. It appears that the omission to draw up the order was the result of a natural and reasonable reflection that it would be better to realise the estates first, and work out the rights of the parties with reference to actual values thus ascertained.—pp. 461, 462.

THURSTON, L.J.—The rule itself is a simple one, founded upon the presumption, that where personal estate is given in terms amounting to a general residuary bequest, to be enjoyed by persons in succession, much persons are to enjoy the same thing in succession, and effectuating the presumed intention of the testator by the conversion into investments approved by the Court of so much of the personality as is at the death of the testator of a wasting, or perishable, or insecure nature, and also of reversionary interests. It has been said that the leaning of the judges of the Court of Chancery in the more modern cases has been against rather than in favour of the application of the rule, and no doubt Wigram, V-C., in Hinves v Hinves (supra, col. 994) takes that view, while the late M.R., in Morgan v Morgan (supra, col. 993), says that "the effect of the latter cases has been to allow small indications of intention to prevent the application of the rule"; but on the other hand Lord Romilly, when in the latter case he is dealing with the contention that the burden of proof does not lie more upon those who oppose than those who support the application of the rule, and that, being a question of construction, it is for the Court to look into the will and discover the testator's real meaning, uses the following words in the same page: "In one sense this is certainly true, but still in my opinion the rule of law is, that unless there can be gathered from the will some expression of intention that the property is to be enjoyed in specie, the rule in Howe v Dartmouth (Earl) is to prevail. It is therefore incumbent on the persons contesting the application of that rule, and on the Court which forbids that application, to point out the words in the will which exclude it, and if this cannot be done the rule must apply"—p. 121.

LORD MACNAGHTEN (for self, LORDS ROBINSON, MORRIS, DAVEY and ROBERTSON).—In this country in the case of income producing property directed by will to be converted, but retained for a time unconverted, for the benefit of the estate, it has been the practice of the Court to put a value on the property and to allow the tenant for life out of the income actually produced a sum equal to 4 per cent on such value. That was the rule laid down by Parker, V.-C., in Meyer v Simonson and followed by Lord Cairns in Brown v Gellatly. Their lordships think that the principle of those cases ought to be applied to the present case but they do not think that it would be expedient to hamper the Court by laying down any fixed rule as to the rate of interest to be allowed to the tenants for life on the estimated value of the capital of the property.—p 16

STIRLING, J.—I am not prepared to say that the rule in Howe v Dartmouth (Earl) can never apply to a case of an absolute gift subject to an executory limitation, but I think that the inference as to the intention of the testator upon which that rule is based is weaker in such a case than when the testator has given his property to persons successively as tenants for life and remaindermen. And, even in a case where the rule in Howe v Dartmouth (Earl) is strictly applicable, an inference of an intention to the contrary has been drawn from the terms of the gift over. That was very much discussed by Cottonham, L.C. in Pickering v Pickering (supra, col 994), where he considers Cullins v Cullins (supra, col 991).—p 746

STIRLING, J.—It is very remarkable that, notwithstanding the long period during which Howe v Dartmouth (Earl) has been in existence, there is no case where it has been applied to a gift which is vested, but liable to be divested on the happening of an event. It seems to me that in that case the inference is much less strong in favour of the supposed wish of the testator, and considering the nature of the rule which that case has given rise to, I am by no means desirous of extending it to a case to which it has not yet been extended.—p 151

COZENS-HARDY, J.—Now, so far as I am aware, the rule in Howe v Dartmouth (Earl) has never been applied except to a disposition by will of residuary personal estate given en masse to be enjoyed by several persons in succession. The Court assumes an intention that the legacies should enjoy the same thing in possession, and, as the only mode of giving effect to such intention, it directs the conversion into permanent authorised investments of all such parts of the residuary estate as are of a wasting or reversionary or unauthorised character—see Pickering v. Pickering (supra, col. 994) and Macdonald v. Reid (supra, col. 996). But the rule does not apply to any bequest which is specific, as distinguished from residuary. On principle, I can see no reason for applying the rule in the present case. The covenant to settle after-acquired property is a contract which has to be performed in strict accordance with its terms. It operates upon that which must be regarded as a specific property—namely, the lady's share in her father's estate. [His lordship then discussed Hope v. Hope, and continued.] Hope v. Hope is important as indicating that in the opinion of the V.-C. the rule does not apply to a marriage settlement, but I cannot treat it as a positive decision to that effect—pp. 826, 827.

CHITTY, J.—In that case it was only necessary to decide whether the postponement of the sale of the business for some years with a view to its sale as a going concern was justified, and the A. held that it was, and that the profits belonged to the tenant for life.—p. 61

NORTH, J.—I do not think that Crowther, In re, goes so far as to show that in this case the sale could be postponed for an indefinite time. There are no special words in the will in that case as here as here. Whether Crowther, In re, has at gone too far I will not stop to consider. But what is suggested does seem to me to go beyond that decision. All I can do is to do what the A. did in Chancellor, In re. The trustees are not bound to sell immediately. I do not think it will be unreasonable that they should have two years.—p. 270.

KEKEWICH, J.—The case arose before me in Baring, In re. . . There was a tenant for life of leasehold property with no provision in the will for that tenant for life bearing the burdens attaching to such leasehold property, such as the payment of rent, repairs and insurance. There I was pressed by the able counsel for the plaintiffs (Sir H. Davey and Mr. Ingle Joyce) with the argument which is stated in the margin. Out point

ents in their hands towards the repairs. No question was decided there between the tenant for life and the remaindermen; only that the trustees, having the property in their hands and having the duty to receive the rents and profits, and also the duty to keep that part of the estate in repair, and having nothing but rents and profits downed by Courtier, In re, which decided that a tenant for life was not bound to do anything at all, but that it must come out of the estate. Then the question came before Stirling, J. In Redding, In re. Stirling, J. thought that I had misinterpreted the decision in Courtier, In re.

The property in Courtier, In re, was not in a good and proper state of repair; there were things which ought to be done to make the lease a good one, and that was the point which the C.A. decided. Stirling, J. thought that the decision of the C.A. was confined to that, and did not understand it as absolving the tenant for life from liability from the date of the testator's death onwards. Of course the judgment of Stirling, J. deserves the respect of the profession and of myself, and it received the respect of myself in Twissman, In re. . . I read Courtier, In re, again, with all the case that I could give to it, in view of the decision of Stirling, J., and I was unable to see that the C.A. had not decided upon the ground which I thought they had decided. There it remains Barry, In re, was not appealed. Now the question comes again before North, J., in Betty, In re, and he has given an elaborate judgment after full argument. It was a considered judgment. He has gone into the cases before that of Courtier, In re, my comments upon which he has considered, and he has gone into the law generally with reference to a tenancy for life of leaseholds. Thus he approaches Courtier, In re, from a judicial aspect, and says that it cannot be intended to introduce new law, and that that is the view expressed by the judges who decided it. Therefore, says North, J., I can quite accept Courtier, In re, by limiting it to the state of things existing at the testator's death, without giving it the more extensive view which Kekewich, J. proposed to do. And then North, J. refers to Ecob v. Milla ([1898] A.C. 390, 67 L.J. (h. 97—P.C.)), and also to a case which, although not binding upon me, is yet entitled to respect and attention, namely, Kingham v. Kingham, where the V.-C. of Ireland also stated that I had misconstrued Courtier, In re, and says "I am of opinion that a tenant for life, whether legal or equitable, is within the maxim, Quæritur, &c." The view I take is that I am not entitled, as a judge, to say that my view of the decision in Courtier, In re, is the right one. I find that Stirling and North, J., and the V.-C. of Ireland all think differently from myself, so I am bound to arrive at the conclusion that I am wrong, and I will act upon that assumption. I do not profess to say that I do not still think that the decision in Courtier, In re, is capable of two interpretations, but I give way. . . I must therefore decide that the tenant for life must take these burdens, including insurances, as the lease contains a covenant to insure.—p. 443.

NORTH, J.—In Betty, In re, the leasehold estate was given to the testator's daughter for life, and she was not bound to do any repairs necessary when her interest commenced, as those repairs had to be borne by the estate of the testator, but she was held liable to indemnify the testator's estate against the breach of covenants during the continuance of the tenancy for life. The question there was between the person interested in the leaseholds and the testator's estate . . .

In the present case there is a claim by a person taking leaseholds as legal tenant in remainder against a tenant for life for loss sustained by the person in remainder on finding the property out of repair, and having to make herself safe by putting it into repair. I asked if there was any precedent for any such action, and no case has been cited to me. It is entirely distinct from Betty, In re, and comes within Cartwright, In re, In re v. Newman, [1889] 55 L.J. Ch. 590; 41 Ch. D. 539. See "WASTE." It is quite true that the latter was a case of freeholds and not leaseholds, but that does not seem to me to make any difference in principle. That case decided that the estate of a legal tenant for life of land was not liable for permissive waste, and that no action in respect of such waste would lie by the remainderman in fee against the executor of the tenant for life.—p. 191.

WOOD, V.-C.—Lord Alvanley [Pearshyn (Lord) v. Hughes] considered it to have been established by Tracy v. Hereford (Lady) that a tenant for life in remainder must bear all arrears of interest which accrued during the life of the preceding tenant for life. In Caulfield v. Maguire, Lord St. Leonards observed that he thought Lord Alvanley had extracted from *Tracy v. NORTH, J.—In Guthrie v. Watford [(1883) 52 L. J. Ch 165, 22 Ch. D 573] Fry, J. points out that where two distinct gifts are made by a will to one person, he can, as a rule, take one and disclaim the other, but his right to do so may be rebutted by a manifestation of a contrary intention on the part of the testator, and that a single and undivided gift is prima facie evidence of such intention. . . . Next in order of date comes Syer v. Gladstone. The headnote looks something like the same point, but after reading the case carefully in the Law Reports and in the Weekly Reporter, I cannot find anything in the decision to justify the headnote. . . . I find no reference whatever to the income of the mortgage arising from the sale of the furniture. . . . I think the decision really was that the sisters were bound to indemnify the estate to the extent of the amount they actually received from the property, but that they were not bound to put their hands into their pockets to make up any deficiency. . . . The next case is Hotchkys, In re. . . . What was done about repairs is immaterial here, but there are certain observations by the L.J. as to the effect of two estates being continued in one devise. . . . Lindley, L.J. says that the tenant for life had one aggregate property given to her, and distinguishes Syer v. Gladstone on the ground that there were two gifts reaching the case as if the headnote were correct—p. 789.

BYRNE, J.—Apart from any question arising from the special terms of the instrument creating the settlement, a tenant for life must keep down the interest accruing during his lifetime on all paramount incumbrances to the extent and out of the rents and profits received by him. If the current rents are insufficient to keep down the interest, subsequent rents arising during his life are applicable to liquidate arrears accruing during the same life tenancy (see Revel v. Watkinson (supra, col. 1002) and Wray v. Hereford (Lady) (supra, col. 1002) and the judgment of Lord St. Leonards in Chesterfield v. Miquire (supra, col. 1002) where he sums up the result of the earlier authorities). Where, as in the present case, several estates are included in the same settlement the tenant for life is bound out of the whole rents and profits to keep down the interest on charges on all the estates—Frewen v. Law Life Assurance Society and Hotchkys, In re. It appears to me upon principle that the tenant for life of several estates included in the same devise remains liable as between himself and the remaindermen to make good arrears of interest accrued during his life tenancy out of subsequent rents received by him from any of the estates, even although the charge in respect of which the arrears have arisen has been paid off by means of a sale of a part of the property. . . . Trevar v. Lawton (supra, col. 1002), Norton v. Johnstone (supra, col. 1002), and Green, In re (supra, col. 1002), appear to me to have little bearing upon the present question. They establish that where there is a trust created for payment of debts out of the income of a testator's estate either by means of accumulation or otherwise, and the debts are in fact lawfully paid out of corpus, the event not being provided for in the will, there is no equity on the part of the remaindermen to have the corpus recouped out of income. No question arose as to any equity which possibly might have arisen had there been arrears of income not kept down—pp. 177, 178.

LINDLEY, M. R.—Macfie v. Macfie (supra, col. 996) covers and decides a point which, but for that, would be a little difficult—that is to say, whether this clause relating to the produce of the unsold real estate and outstanding personal estate can apply to property which does not yield income. That was a difficulty which was solved in Macfie v. Macfie by the V.-C. of England, who held that it did, and Stirling, J. has taken the same view. The decision rests upon this principle—that if you look at the will as a whole, the tenant for life is, to take the income of the residuary estate for better or for worse. Hove v. Dartmouth (Earl) (supra, col. 991) does not apply against the tenant for life or in his favour. In other words, if the property is yielding more income than the tenant for life is entitled to, she is to have it, and if less, then she is to go without it.—p. 565

WATKIN, L. J.—If I had to deal simply with the question of construction, I should have hesitated a good deal before I came to the conclusion that Stirling, J. was wrong in treating Macfie v. Macfie as a decision covering this case. It is not necessary to say anything from my point of view about that, and I must be held not to express any opinion about it.—p. 568

ROMER, J.—Two cases were relied on by counsel for the heirs-at-law. With regard to Wall v. Byrne, whether or not it was rightly decided—a question which I need not consider—it is no authority on the case now before me. The proposition stated by Sugden, L. C. was this: "Where a man has an estate pur autre vie, limited to him and his heirs, and devises that estate, by words which, without words of limitation, would pass the quasi inheritance, and the devisees die intestate, the persons to take are the heirs and not the personal representatives of the devisee." Assuming this proposition to be correct, it is no authority, because here the testator was not entitled to an estate pur autre vie limited to him and his heirs—he was entitled in fee. And if the English decision referred to in that case was Philpotts v. James, whether or not that case was an authority for the decision in Wall v. Byrne, it is no authority in the present case, for it is not in point. It was a case of a lease for lives limited to one and his heirs. The owner of the estate died, having by his will devised "all and singular my freehold lease" to his nephew, and on the nephew's death it was held that his heir-at-law, and not his legal personal representative, became entitled. Lord Mansfield's judgment shows the ground of the decision: "The words of the will of T. James are general. He gives all his freehold lease. It is the same as if he had added 'heirs.'" That is to say, it was, in effect, a case of the heir being specially mentioned—p. 446.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The only intelligible rule to apply is that pointed out in Plowden (Brace- bridge v. Cook), which is an intelligible working rule. If property be vested in a woman and another, or others, as joint tenants, and she afterwards marries, what is the effect of her marriage upon that property? If the effect is to vest the property in the husband then there will be a severance of the joint tenancy. That is the view of Lord Coke, Plowden, and everyone. If on the other hand the act of marriage does not vest the property in the husband, then there is no severance. That is the view of Lord Coke, Plowden, and everyone except Malins, V.-C., who in Baillie v. Treharne did hold that marriage effected a severance of the joint tenancy in a wife's chose in action. I think that was an oversight on the part of the learned judge.

There is no authority in favour of the respondents' view except that case. Although it is true that Barton's Will, in re, and Armstrong v.
Armstrong (supra) may have been decided on the ground that the fund was reversionary, which was a good ground, still the other ground, viz., that it was a chose in action, might have been taken. At any rate, there is nothing in other decision against the rule I have suggested—

The principles of the law of estoppel by a judgment, inter partes, to which alone I think it necessary to refer, may be taken from De Grey, C.J.'s opinion in the Duchess of Kingston's Case, and from that of Knight Bruce, V.C. in Baird v. Wootton; and though, in the report in Yelverton, expressions are used, which at first sight appear to make a distinction between actions for unliquidated damages and debts, yet, upon a comparison of all the reports, it seems clear that the true ground of the decision was not the circumstance of the damages being unliquidated. Popham, C.J. states the true ground, he says, "If one hath judgment to recover in trespass against one, and damages certain," that is converted into certainty by the judgment, "although he be not satisfied, he shall not have a new action for this trespass by the same reason, contra, if one hath cause of action against two, and obtain judgment against one, he shall not have remedy against the other, and the difference betwixt this case, and the case of debt and obligation against two, is, because there every of them is chargeable and liable to the entire debt, and, therefore, recovery against one is no bar against the other, until satisfaction"—p. 32.

SIR J. HANBURY.—But then it was said that as a question of law the contra which has been pursued by the plaintiffs precludes them from now having recourse to the estate of the father, and that argument is based upon the decision in Kendall v. Hamilton. Now, in that case, it was undoubtedly decided, confirming the decision in King v. Hoare, a case which has always attracted a good deal of attention, that where some members of a firm or some joint contractors are sued and judgment is obtained against them, the matter then passes into a res judicata and is to be treated thenceforth as a debt against those persons only against whom that judgment has been recovered, and recourse cannot be had to a person who was not joined in that action. That, of course, must be taken as now clearly established; but in that case it was from the beginning pointed out that there is an exception to that rule, one which had long prevailed in equity, to the effect that when one member of a firm has died, though at law the debt would from that time forth be only the debt of the survivors, in equity recourse might always be had to the estate of the deceased partner. That is very clearly laid down by Cotton, L.J., in the judgment which he delivered on behalf of himself, the present M. J., and Thesiger, L.J., in Kendall v. Hamilton, where he says, "It is now well established that a Court of equity does treat the estate of a deceased partner as still liable to the partnership creditors, though at law the survivor has become solely liable. And it must now be considered as established that the partnership creditor may obtain relief against the estate of the deceased partner without having exhausted his remedy against the survivor." He goes on to say, "It is difficult to understand how the Court of Chancery came to interfere with the legal liability of partners, and although it has done so, it has, in giving the partnership creditor relief, dealt with him in an anomalous way, that is to say, except in cases where there has been no joint estate, the Court has only admitted the partnership creditor to rank against the estate of the deceased, after all his private or separate debts have been paid." That passage has a very important bearing on a matter to which I shall subsequently refer. He says, in conclusion "It is unnecessary to go through the numerous cases which were cited during the argument, but it will be right to refer to Liverpool Borough Bank v. Walker (1859) 4 De G. & J. 24, and Jacob v. Harwood (1751) 2 Ves sen 265, as in those cases judgments recovered against some of several partners were held not to be a bar to proceedings in equity against the estate of a deceased partner. But in each of those cases the judgment was not recovered until after the death of the partner against whose estate the creditor was seeking relief, and in each case, in which relief has been given, the court against the estate of a deceased partner, cannot be established. From and after his death, he ceases to be subject to a separate or several liability. Now this view of the law is adopted by almost every member of the House of Lords who took part in the discussion of the doctrine. It is stated by Lord Cairnes, by Lord Harbrough, by Lord Selborne and by Lord O'Hagan, and I believe I said this clearly in saying that we have only to consider the case of the deceased partner in the case of the judgment by the Court of Chancery, and it would be impossible for us to insist such a course of opinion of such high authority as we have. We come, therefore, with all our hesitation to the conclusion that this is the correct view of the law.—p 187.

STIRLING, J., held that the right of a surety against his principal are not exactly the same as those of the creditor, and that accordingly the rule laid down in Kendall v. Hamilton, that a creditor who has recovered judgment against one partner cannot sue another partner, did not take away the rights of a surety for one partner as against another partner.

FIELD, J.—There [Drake v. Mitchell] it was held that where one of three covenants gave a bill for part of a debt secured by the covenant, and judgment was recovered against him on the bill, that judgment was no bar to an action of covenant against the three. On looking into that case it is clear that the decision proceeded on the technical rule that the giving of a bill of exchange could not suspend the remedy on the covenant, which was a security of a higher nature.—p 232.

MANISTY, J.—As to Drake v. Mitchell, I agree that it is distinguishable from the present case on the ground suggested by Field, J., namely, that the covenant was a security of a higher nature than a bill of exchange, but I think there is another and perhaps a more substantial ground, which is, that the bill in that case was a collateral security, and was not given for the same liability or debt as was secured by the covenant.—p 234. And see post.

That case, therefore, greatly differed from the present, in which there is no certain precise averment in the deed of release of any such in T. Jarvis, the younger, but a recital only, that he was legally or equitably entitled.—p. 281

LORD BLACKBURN.—The principles which have assumed to be law have been recognised in England ever since the clear judgment of Parke, B. in Freeman v. Cooke. The Scottish cases cited at your lordships' bar show that those principles have not been so clearly recognised in Scotland.—p. 101.

LORD WATSON.—The question whether a forged bill has or has not been adopted by the person whose signature is forged, is in reality an issue of fact and not of law. Still, adoption of a bill may be matter of legal inference from certain ascertained facts; and in the present case the inference which has been drawn by the Court below, adversely to the appellant, appears to depend upon the fact, that after he came to know in July that the second bill had been discounted with the bank, he (the appellant) kept silence, or at least did not inform the bank of the forgery of his own name until a fortnight or thereby had elapsed. The only reasonable rule which I can conceive to be applicable in such circumstances is that which is expressed in several carefully chosen language by Lord Wensleydale in Freeman v. Cooke,—p. 109. [His lordship also discussed the Scottish cases.] And see post.

LORD BLACKBURN (for self, SIR B. PEACOCK, SIR R. COLLIER, SIR R. COUCH and SIR A. HOBHOUSE).—The principle on which a person, having clothed an agent with apparent general authority, but restricted it by secret instructions, is bound (if the other party chooses to hold him so) to one who, in ignorance of the restrictions, contracts through the agent, on the faith of the agent having the authority he seems to have, is well explained in Freeman v. Cooke. The principal does not actually contract, but the person, who thought he did, has the option to preclude him from denying that he contracted, if the case is brought within the very accurate statement of the law by Parke, B. (on p. 663): "If the person means his representation to be acted upon, and it is acted upon accordingly, and if, whatever a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe that it was meant that he should act upon it, and did act upon it as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth; and conduct by negligence or omission, where there is a duty cast upon a person by usages of trade or otherwise to disclose the truth, may often have the same effect"—p. 133.

LORD WATSON (for self, LORDS ROBBESON and DAVEY and SIR R. COCHRAN).—The ground upon which the plea of estoppel rested in these cases [M'Kenzie v. British Linen Co. and similar cases] was the fact that the customer, being in the exclusive knowledge of the forgery, withheld that knowledge from the bank until its chance of recovering from the forger had been materially prejudiced. Here, an agent of the bank had earlier and better information as to the forgeries than the customer himself.—p. 60.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—I am bound to suppose this case to have been properly decided by the majority of the members of the House who voted upon it. But, in considering the doctrine of law which is established, I must look to the facts which those who decided it considered to be proved by the evidence. I must look at that evidence and see what different inferences are to be drawn from it, and that the law laid down is accommodated to those inferences. The majority of the lords thought that nothing more was proved than the declaration of a present intention not to enforce the bond. Therefore, it is not legitimate reasoning after comparing the evidence there with the evidence in this case, to argue that there, as much as here, a positive assertion of a fact had been made. The doctrine there laid down and acted upon was, that where a person possesses a legal right a Court of equity will not interfere to restrain him from enforcing it, though between the time of its creation and that of his attempt to enforce it he has made representations of his intention to abandon it. This is the ratio decidendi, and this only is binding upon us. We are not called upon to give any opinion upon the point of law upon which the law lords were divided, as to the difference between a misrepresentation of a fact as it actually existed, and a misrepresentation of an intention to do or to abstain from doing an act which would lead to the damage of the party thereby induced to do an act on the faith of the representation. Taking the law as there laid down, that a mere expression of intention, although acted upon, is no ground for equitable interference, we are to say whether in this case, considering the evidence, we come to the conclusion that there was here a mere expression of an intention not to do an act.—p. 10. STUART, V.-C.—Although the decision in that case is no doubt binding, it cannot be considered as a reversal of the decision of the H. L. in Hammerley v. De Biel, and the proposition attributed to Lord Cranworth in the printed report, that a statement or representation of what a person intends or does not intend is not sufficient, seems irreconcilable with the decision of the H. L. in Hammerley v. De Biel, and with the law as laid down by all judges of the highest authority. It is remarkable that Hammerley v. De Biel was not referred to by any of the counsel or law lords in Jorden v. Money.—p. 51. And see post, col. 1020.

STUART, V.-C.—I have stated that the law on this subject is perplexed by authorities, but my mind is as clear on the weight of those authorities as possible. I think that Lord Cottenham and the H. L. in Hammersey v. De Biel, through Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell, have, with the utmost care, stated the doctrine as it really ought to prevail in this Court. Lord Cottenham, in that case, when it was before him as L. C., said, "A representation made by one party for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the other party, and acted on by him, will, in general, be sufficient to entitle him to the assistance of this Court for the purpose of realising such representation." That I conceive to be an accurate statement of the equitable principle which would lead to a situation after the contract different from what would have existed if the representations had not been made, and then persons making those representations shall, so far as the power of a Court of equity extends, be treated as if the representations were true, and shall be compelled to make them good; but those must be representations concerning existing facts.

The limits of that doctrine, and the distinction between it and a contract, were carefully examined, and well pointed out in the judgment given by Lord Cranworth in this House in Jorden v. Money, where, after referring to

Brougham and by Lord Campbell in Hammersey v. De Biel. There are, moreover, subsequent cases in this Court in which that of Hammersey v. De Biel has been followed. . . . To say that in Guthrie, In re, I departed in the least from the doctrine laid down by Lord Cottenham in Hammersey v. De Biel is a mistake. Indeed I referred to Hammersey v. De Biel . . . and I considered the evidence there adduced before me to be too loose and not specific enough as to the sum, and insufficient to prove that the representation had been made to the proper person.—p 867

SELBORNE, L.C.—I apprehend that nothing can be more certain than that the doctrine of equitable estoppel by representation is a wholly different thing from contract or promise or equitable assignment, or anything of that sort. The foundation of the doctrine, which is a very important one, and certainly not one likely to be departed from, is this; that if a man dealing with another for value makes statements to him as to existing facts, which being so stated would affect the contract, and without reliance on which, or without a statement of which, the party would not have entered into the contract, and which being otherwise than as they were stated,

—H. L. (L.) SELBORNE, L.C., LORDS OHAGAN, BLACKBURN and FITZGERALD; affirming 8 C. 466, 7 Q. B. D. 174; 45 L. T. 334, 29 W. R. 656.—C. A. BRAMWELL, DAGGALLAY and BRETT, LJJ.; which reversed (1880) 49 L. J. Ex. 801, 5 Ex. D. 298, 43 L. T. 319; 29 W. R. 105.—STEPHEN, J., and which was explained in Humphreys v. Glean (1882) 52 L. J. Q. B. 140; 10 Q. B. D. 148, 48 L. T. 60, 47 J. P. 241.—C. A. DAGGALLAY and BRETT, LJJ.

SELBORNE, L.C.—It was admitted, in the argument at the bar, that the appellant had endeavoured to bring her case within the supposed authority of Laffus v. Maw, decided by Stuart, V.-C. (under circumstances not dissimilar) on the doctrine of representation; for which purpose the V.-C. relied upon some expressions used by Lord Cottenham in Hammersey v. De Biel (12 Cl. & F. 45, at p. 62, n.), and considered himself at liberty to disregard the reasons assigned by Lord Cranworth and Lord Brougham for the later decision of this House in Jorden v. Money. Stephen, J. and the C. A. (rightly in my opinion) took a different view. I have always understood it to have been decided in Jorden v. Money, that the doctrine of estoppel by representation is applicable only to representations as to some state of facts alleged to be at the time actually in existence, and not to promises de futuro, which, if binding at all, must be binding as contracts.—a distinction which is illustrated by such cases as Prole v. Soudy (supra, col 1018) and Piggott v. Stratton (supra, col 1017). Hammersey v. De Biel was a case of contract for valuable consideration, duly signed so as to fulfil the requirements of the Statute of Frauds, in the view both of Lords Langdale and Cottenham in Ch., and of Lord Campbell in the H. L. Those decisions are consistent with each other. Hammersley v. De Biel does not justify, and Jorden v. Money is irreconcilable with, the reasons stated by the V.-C. for his judgment in Loffin v. May—p. 473.

LORD O'HAGAN.—I quite agree that the authorities on which that ruling [of the V.-C. in Loffin v. May] was based, do not sufficiently sustain it. This case must be dealt with not on the ground of representation, but as one of contract, having relation to some binding engagement for future conduct, and not to a responsibility created by any misleading averment of existing facts.—p. 483

LORD MACNAGHTEN (for self, LORDS ROBERTS, MORRIS and SIR R. COCHRAN).—The doctrine to that case, the accuracy of which was not challenged by the learned counsel for the respondents, is in the following words:—"Where a person possesses a legal right, a Court of equity will not interfere to restrain him from enforcing it, though, between the time of its creation and that of his attempt to enforce it, he has made representations of his intention to abandon it. Nor will equity interfere, even though the parties to whom these representations were made have acted on them, and have in full belief of them entered into irrevocable engagements. To raise an equity in such a case, there must be a misrepresentation of existing facts, and not of mere intention"—p. 45.

ROMER, J.—The principle of equitable estoppel has been clearly stated, if I may say so, by Lord Selborne in *Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. LINDLEY, M.R.—Now, is this an ancient document which purports upon the face of it to show exercise of ownership? I say unquestionably yes, it is not an act of ownership, but it shows that there was an act of ownership. On that ground, it seems to me, it is admissible. For the reasons I have given I think that Papendick v. Bridgwater has no application. This document is not an admission by the tenant against his landlord, it comes under another head altogether.

PARKE, B.—The authority of Lord Tenterden at Nisi Prius, in the case of Bloxam v. Elsee, is no doubt to the contrary, but since that case, as well as before, there have been many reported decisions, that whatever a party says, or his acts amounting to admissions, are evidence against himself, though such admissions may involve what must necessarily be contained in some deed or writing; for instance, a statement by a party, or one under whom he claims, that an estate had been conveyed to or from such person, or that such person filled the character of assignee, which could only be by deed, or the like (see Dunkinson v. Charnock, 1 B. & Ald. 677). Any one experienced in the conduct of causes at Nisi Prius, must know how constant the practice is. Indeed, if such evidence were inadmissible, the difficulties thrown in the way of almost every trial would be nearly insuperable.—p. 668.

Stobart v. Dryden (1836) 1 M. & W. 615, 2 Gale 146; 5 L. J. Ex. 218

PARKE, B. (for the Court)—The first case referred to is that of Wright v. Littler, in which it appeared that a witness for the plaintiff, on his cross-examination by defendant's counsel, stated that the subscribing witness to an instrument, the validity of which as a will formed a part of the defendant's case, acknowledged in his last illness, on producing as a true document a prior will which he had in his custody, that the instrument in question was forged by himself. No objection was taken to the evidence at the trial. On a motion for a new trial . . . he (Lord Mansfield) says "That the account given in the last moments of the subscribing witness was proper, even though it had been upon an examination of the plaintiff, and as the account was a confession of a great enormity, and as he could be under no temptation to say it but to do justice and ease his conscience, he was of opinion that it was proper to be left to the jury, but, independently of that declaration, he thought fraud and forgery were apparent." From this report it is clear that Lord Mansfield by no means lays it down distinctly as an established rule of evidence that such a declaration, even when made in extremis, is admissible.

On the authority of this case, Mr Justice Heath, at Nisi Prius, admitted evidence that the attesting witness in his dying moments begged pardon of Heaven for having been concerned in forging the bond or will, and Lord Ellenborough, who states that decision, and apparently with approbation, twice, in 6 East 195, and 1 Camp. 211, says that it was admitted on the ground that, as the subscribing witness might have been cross-examined as to the fact, his declaration of the fact might have been proved, in contradiction to the presumption of a due execution of the bond from the proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness; and he also adds, that the propriety of the reception of the evidence was not questioned. This ruling of Mr Justice Heath was also referred to by Mr Justice Bayley in Doe v. Ridgway (4 B. & Ald. 55). Such is the state of the authorities, and when it is considered in how qualified a manner the opinion of Lord Mansfield, the origin and foundation of the others, is expressed, and when it is recollected that both then and at the time of the nisi prius trial before Mr. Justice Heath an opinion prevailed (which is now properly exploded) that any declaration in extremis was admissible, on the ground that the solemnity of the occasion was equivalent to a declaration on oath, which consideration certainly had an influence on the mind of Lord Mansfield at least, it is impossible to say that there is any such weight of authority as to induce us to hold that this case is established and recognised as an exception from the great principle of our law of evidence that facts, the truth of which depends on parole evidence, are to be proved by testimony on oath.

[Counsel objected to the admissibility of a letter, and cited the description of Alderson, B., of the commencement of a controversy (in which sense in nota was to be taken in such cases), as being the arising of a state of facts, on which the claim is founded, without anything more.]

LINDLEY, M.R. — The question left to the jury as stated in the issue is whether the piece of land therein described "is common land or subject to any commonable rights either of the commoners of the parish of Cantref or of the commoners of the parish of Llanfynyach." In other words, whether the piece of land in question is part of any common over which any one in either of those parishes has any right of common. This is a question of such general interest in the locality as to let in evidence of reputation. Dunraven (Earl) v. Llewellyn, . . . is no authority to the contrary, for the pleadings in that case show that the issue there was simply whether a piece of land was the plaintiffs' or the defendant's. Warwick v. Queen's College, Oxford, shows that Dunraven (Earl) v. Llewellyn does not go so far as is sometimes supposed.

JESSUP, M.B.—I adopt the view of Parke, B., in Reg. v. Lower Heyford, that it must be prima facie against interest, that is, the natural meaning of the entry, standing alone, must be against the interest of the man who makes it. Of course, if you show altruism that the man had a particular reason for making it, and that it was for his interest, you may destroy the value of the evidence altogether, but the question of admissibility is not a question of value. . . . But then, it was said, you must have something to show, prima facie, the connection of the entry with the debt. Even assuming the rule could go so far as that, I do not understand that any judge has said that you must prove the debt incontestably. I do not suppose any judge has said that, though in Dee v. Voiles, Littledale, J. rejected evidence which I think ought to have been received. That was the case of a bill for repairs by a carpenter, with a receipt for the amount of it and it was said there was no evidence that the repairs had been done. It was not in favour of the interest of the carpenter, because he had given a receipt for the whole bill, and I see no reason why the entry was not fairly admissible. It proved that the carpenter had been paid for what work he had done. It appears to me to be clearly an entry against interest, and I so far prefer the decision of Parke, B. to the decision of Littledale, J.—p. 799.

GIFFARD, l. j..—The case decided by Malins, V.-C., was In re Benham's Trusts. He adopted and acted on the decisions of Kindersley, V.-C., [in the other three cases mentioned above], but went somewhat further, laying it down that "if you cannot presume death at any particular period during the seven years, then at the end or expiration of the seven years you must presume, for the first time, that the person was dead, and you must also presume that within that time he is alive." In re Benham's Trusts was appealed, and Balf. L. J., in November, 1867, discharged the Vice-Chancellor's order, and directed further inquiries, simply stating that there was no evidence for the Court to act upon, and that it was a case, not of presumption, but of proof (p. 144). The leading case, however, is one at law—viz., Doe v. Noyes . . . The Exchequer Chamber adopted the doctrine of the Court of Queen's Bench in these terms, viz.—"We adopt the doctrine of the Court of Queen's Bench—that the presumption of law relates only to the fact of death, and that the time of death, whenever it is material, must be a subject of distinct proof." It is obvious from these passages that there is an inconsistency between that which the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer Chamber laid down, and what I have quoted from the judgment of Malins, V.-C. as going beyond what was laid down by Kindersley, V.-C. Kindersley, V.-C., however, seems to have founded his opinion on certain portions of these two judgments (p. 147). Kindersley, V.-C., appears to have acted on the passages in both those judgments which are to the effect that the onus of proving the death lay on the plaintiff, because the law presumes that a person shown to be alive at a given time remains alive until the contrary be shown. Those passages are not essential to the conclusions arrived at, or sound in point of reasoning (p. 149) . . . The true proposition is, that those who found a right upon a person having survived a particular period must establish that fact affirmatively by evidence. The evidence will necessarily differ in different cases, but sufficient evidence there must be, or the person asserting title will fail.—p. 152.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—One observation I wish to make upon another part of the case to which my noble and learned friend has adverted—that is, to the admission of the letter from Moffatt. . . . It is perfectly true that under a decision pronounced by Bosanquet, J. in the Common Pleas (Anderson v. Weston), to which I adverted in the course of the argument, the practice has been to treat the date in a letter as its true date. This matter was under consideration in the Court of Exchequer at the time when my noble and learned friend opposite was a member of that Court in the case of Potes v. Glossop, where it was laid down by the judges that we were compelled, by the many cases which had been decided, to hold the date to be prima facie evidence as to the time of writing the letter, but we intimated our opinion very strongly—at least, I did, and I believe my noble and learned friend contented with me—that it would be proper to take the opinion of a superior Court by a bill of exceptions, if that point should ever become material. I observe that that case has been followed in one of two cases that are referred to in the note of that case of Potes v. Glossop—p. 646.

WESTBURY, L. C.—I confess I am unable to conceive the analogy between a client closing the mouth of his solicitor upon a question as to professional communications, and the conduct of the jeweller in Armory v. Delamirie, who, upon a mounted jewel which had been found being brought to him, took out the stones and returned the empty socket to the finder, and not producing the jewel at the trial of the action brought to recover its value, was made to pay in damages the value of a jewel of the purest water, which would fit the socket, upon the rule omnis presumitur contra spoliatorem. But a person who refuses to allow his solicitor to violate the confidence of the professional relation cannot be regarded in that odious light. The law has so great a regard to the preservation of the secrecy of this relation, that even the party himself cannot be compelled to disclose his own statements made to his solicitor with reference to professional business.—p. 591.

BUCKLEY, J.—It appears to me that I can apply the principle of the cases relating to sisters also to widows who have had children. It is said that there are two cases to the contrary Croton v May is the first of these, it seems to me to be distinguishable. There the age was fifty-four years and six months, the lady had had no children, but the married life had practically been only about three years, for although she had been actually married for seventeen years, husband and wife had been separated for the first fourteen years. There the absence of capacity to bear children had not been sufficiently proved. The other case is In re Hocking. The principle there laid down is that the Court will not make the presumption for the purpose of depriving a living person of a possible interest. LINDLEY, M.R. says: "If property is given to A in the event of B having no children, and A claim that property before the death of B. My answer is, no, neither at law nor in equity, unless B's possible child is the only person who can deprive A of the property. When that is the case, the Court of Chancery has ordered funds under its control to be paid to A when satisfied that B, owing to her age, can have no child." The case before me is exactly within that exception. In my opinion In re Hocking does not apply in this case, and I hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the funds paid to them.

JAMES, L.J.—This case appears to me entirely different from Stewart v. Great Western Railway Co., where, while a poor man was lying suffering from an accident persons went to him on behalf of the railway company, and induced him to accept a small and almost nominal sum in full of all demands, making false representations to him as to the medical opinions which had been given about his state. That was a case where a directly fraudulent and false statement was made to the man to induce him to enter into the arrangement, and, under those circumstances, it appears to me to be of course that this Court should not relinquish its jurisdiction to deal with a case of fraud, but should say that the company was not to be entitled to use at all, for any purpose or under any circumstances, the document which had been obtained in that way (p. 530). . . . The bill nowhere charges that the doctors ever made a false representation, or were guilty of any concealment, and the doctors themselves all swore that they throughout gave the plaintiff their advice and opinion to the best of their judgment—p. 532.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that parol evidence can no more be admitted to contradict or qualify an implied warranty than it could have been if the warranty had been expressed Gatcliffe v.
Bourne, in error, has sometimes been supposed to be an authority to the contrary, but it is misunderstood. There it was necessary to prove the course and usage of delivery in the port of London, and therefore it was necessary that evidence to disprove the custom should also be admitted. It was upon this ground, and this only, that evidence of what the parties did was admitted—it was not let in for the purpose of altering or explaining the contract. . . And it seems plain on principle that every mischief arising from admitting parol evidence, to vary a written contract, arises equally whether it is admitted to vary an express or an implied part of that contract.—p. 697

WILLIS, J.—With respect to the case of Jeffery
v. Walton I wish to say that, notwithstanding the high reputation of the reporter, I think he must have misrepresented the reason why the plaintiff was precluded from giving any evidence as to the time of hiring and rate of payment. The writing in that case did not purport to be an agreement, but was only a memorandum in pencil, and the judge who decided the case of Watson v. Hargreaves (5 East 10), could hardly have meant to describe it as a binding agreement.—

PARK, B. (for the Court)—This question subsequently came under the consideration of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Senior v.
Armitage. In that case which was an action by a tenant against his landlord for a compensation for seed and labour, under the denomination of tenant-right, Mr. Justice Bayley, on its appearing that there was a written agreement between the parties, nonsuited the plaintiff. The Court afterwards set aside that nonsuit, and held, as appears by a manuscript note of that learned Judge, that though there was a written contract between landlord and tenant, the custom of the country would still be binding, if not inconsistent with the terms of such written contract, and that, not only all common law obligations,
but those imposed by custom, were in full force where the contract did not vary them. Mr. Holt appears to have stated the case too strongly when he said that the Court held the custom to be operative, "unless the agreement in express terms excluded it," and probably he was not quite accurate in attributing a similar opinion to the Lord Chief Baron Thompson, who presided on the second trial. It would appear that the Court held that the custom operated, unless it could be collected from the instrument, either expressly or impliedly, that the parties did not mean to be governed by it.—p. 476.

CAMPRELL, C.J. (for the Court).—It is the business of Courts reasonably so to shape their rules of evidence as to make them suitable to the habits of mankind, and such as are not likely to exclude the actual facts of the dealings between parties when they are to determine on the controversies which grow out of them. It cannot be doubted in the present case that in fact this contract was made with the usage understood to be a term in it; to exclude the usage is to exclude a material term of the contract, and must lead to an unjust decision. Of course, this could be no reason for a decision contrary to authority, but we think any one who reads the judgment of the Court in Trueman v. Loder with attention will perceive how much it was influenced by a feeling of the supposed inconvenience of receiving any parol evidence in the case of a written contract. And, as it was not necessary to the decision of the case then before the Court, we are not bound by it now; and we did not hold ourselves bound by it in the case of Brown v. Byrne (3 E. & B. 708), when it was brought to our notice.

JESSEL, M.R., in discussing the cases, held that the decisions turned entirely on the admissibility of the evidence of trade usage, and that, if such evidence had not been there admissible, they would have been decided the other way. "If therefore appears to me," his lordship said, "both on principle and authority, taking the only authorities which were relied upon by the Court below in support of the contrary proposition that in all cases like this the broker is not personally liable" Kelly, O.B. and Mellish, L.J. both agreed that in these cases the reason for the decisions was the evidence as to trade usage.

ESHER, M.R.—In this case the defendants are clearly not liable upon the contract itself, they were selling as agents for an owner, and in the absence of trade usage no liability would attach to them. The evidence of the witnesses who were called to prove the custom came to this, that if the name of the owner was not given in, or at the time of the making of, the contract, the buyer had the right to treat the broker as principal. I can well conceive that in this trade (the hop trade), and in many others, such a custom is for the broker's benefit, and I am clearly of opinion that the evidence was properly admitted by the learned judge at the trial. If any remarks of mine in the judgment in Hutchinson v. Tatham are in conflict with our present decision they must be considered as withdrawn.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Spartali v. Bencke, in which the circumstances were hardly distinguishable from the present is no doubt directly against the admissibility of evidence of usage in this case, but that decision proceeds upon what appears to me to be the mistaken ground that the effect of the introduction of a custom as to the time of delivery of the thing sold would be to alter the time, or to vary the time fixed for payment by the written contract; whereas the time for payment would not be altered, and the custom could only affect the time for delivery, with respect to which the written contract is silent.—p. 170.

BRAMWELL, J.—I think the case of *The Earl of Falmouth v. The evidence proffered was a conveyance by the former to the latter, then it was reasonable that parol evidence should be admitted of that conveyance. The title was proved to be in Urry. Yet the Court upheld a nonsuit, which in fact affirmed that there was title in neither. It is a strange decision.

His observations, I have no doubt, had reference to the title of Rosina Frost, who, it appears, claims under a mortgage. To suppose that he could intend to place a solicitor's lien upon the same footing as a mortgage title, would be to impute a position quite at variance with his general accuracy.—p. 339

Hubbard v. Knight (1848) 2 Ex. 11; 17 L. J. Ex. 119; 12 Jur. 162.

PARKER, B.—There a witness, an attorney, refused to produce a title deed because it was his client's, but he told the contents of the deed willingly. My brother Ludlow objected to the evidence, not on the ground that the attorney was privileged, but that no secondary evidence could be given of the deed which was itself in existence. My brother Patteson ruled that secondary evidence might be given, as the party was not obliged to give up his deeds, and that, if the attorney did not insist upon his privilege, but chose willingly to disclose the contents of them, the evidence might be received. Thus explained, the case is correct.—p. 12.

ALDERSON, B.—The second point in the case of Marston v. Downes requires explanation. It would seem, from the report of that case, that an attorney can be compelled by the Court to divulge the contents of his client's deeds. The Court will hear him, and receive his evidence, if he does so willingly, but the Court cannot insist upon it.—p. 12

Dwyer v. Collins (1852) 7 Ex. 689, 21 L. J. Ex. 225, 16 Jur. 569

PARKER, B. (for the Court).—That the privilege of an attorney does not extend to protect him from answering whether the document is then in Court was decided by Best, C.J., at mai prius, in Beran v. Waters (1 Moo. & M. 235).

On the other hand, some authorities were cited against the admissibility of this question. The first is Cook v. Hearn, in which it is said that Patteson, J. refused to permit the question to be put with respect to a rule of Court because "no notice to produce had been given," and he also decided, that a notice to produce then was too late, and the report goes on to state that the course adopted was approved by Taunton, J. and myself, in the following term. It is very doubtful from the report whether the question was disallowed by Patteson, J., and so far as I am concerned, I think there must be a mistake, either of my own or of the reporters, as it is at variance with the opinion I have always had on that point; and on referring to my manuscript note of the motion for a new trial in Michaelmas

Term, 1832, I find no trace of such a circumstance. The rule was moved for on the ground that it appeared on the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness that there was a written agreement or lease, which was not produced, and the rule was granted, suggesting a vet process. This case is by no means a sufficient authority, and no other was cited which is in point, nor are we aware of any. This objection cannot therefore prevail.—p. 646

Tremain v Barrett (1815) 6 Taunt. 88; 1 Marsh. 463, 668, 16 R. R. 564

GIBBS, J. observed, that the practice of the Court of King's Bench as to the costs of the witnesses' return, was clearly ascertained to be such as was contended for by the plaintiffs. The reporter, in the decision in Schimmel v Louisa, had omitted there to state one part of the practice in such a case in the Court of King's Bench, namely, that in that Court the costs of his return were given. Their practice was certified to be that there the costs of bringing a witness over were not to be allowed, the costs of his detention were to be allowed, and the costs of his return were to be allowed, but the plaintiffs were met by the decision in this Court, that the costs of sending back the witnesses are not to be given.—p. 91

COTTON, L. J.—The case is quite different from the case which was relied upon in the Court below, of Berdan v. Greenwood. There the Court was satisfied that the reason given for the plaintiff's not coming to England was a pretence, and was only brought forward to enable him to avoid being cross-examined in Court. The Court said they would not assist him in that scheme, and that if his evidence were material to his case, he must come and give it in person. That authority, we think, does not apply to the present case.—p. 528.

ESHER, M.R.—In consequence of the case cited [Kemp v. Tennant] we have communicated with Matthew, J., and he tells us that he never meant to say or to cite Mr. Justice Wills as having said that the grant of a commission was ex debito justitiæ in the sense in which the expression was used by the plaintiff's counsel in argument. It is clear that according to the established practice it is a matter of judicial discretion, and the commission ought only to be granted on reasonable grounds being shown for its issue.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The case of Thomas v. Stutterheim was cited, which is referred to by Mr. Day in his book on the Common Law Procedure Act (3rd ed., p. 245). The headnote of that case does not correctly report the decision. The Court there doubted whether they had power to make an order absolute in the first instance for the examination of a witness on the point of death, the application not being incidental to any motion or summons. Mr. Day seems correctly to give the result of the case when he says, "It would seem that the section was intended only to provide evidence upon otherwise pending motions or summonses." This case is not, therefore, at all inconsistent with the construction we are now putting on the statute, and it appears to me that the construction is in accordance both with the natural meaning of the terms used and the reason of the thing—p. 185.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Now I assume that there is no objection in a case in which the Court thinks it right to an order being made ex parte for the examination of witnesses de bene esse. There may be many cases in which the ends of justice may require it, but every such order must be taken subject to being discharged if any person seeking to discharge it can show that it was not proper because not necessary for the purposes of justice, and I cannot think that the earlier authorities, such as that before Lord Eldon of Bellamy v. Jones, and others which have been mentioned, really meant more than this, that prima facie, and for the purpose of the question, whether the order was regularly made ex parte or not, if it was brought within a certain category of cases it would be right and not irregular to obtain it ex parte. I do not understand Lord Eldon as having meant to lay down even as to those cases in which there would be sufficient prima facie ground for obtaining an ex parte order to examine witnesses de bene esse, that no reasons or grounds could be shown why, upon a motion to discharge such an order consistent with its formal regularity, it should be discharged.—p. 9.

CAIRNS, L.C.—The case of Wright v. Wilkin appears to have come before the Court upon a very unusual and, I should think, irregular application. I take it that the course that would be pursued would be this.—If a witness, or his counsel, thought that he was being unfairly dealt with upon an examination, he might refuse to answer a particular question, and upon that refusal the matter might be brought before the Court, who would decide whether the examiner was pursuing a proper course or not, in allowing the witness to be treated as a hostile witness. It is, however, unnecessary now to decide that question. I only refer to it lest I should be thought to have assented to the view that the examiner is powerless in a case of that kind.—p. 129.

Small v. Nairne (1849) 13 Q. B. 840.

DENMAN, C.J.—I am tempted to remark, for the benefit of the profession, that Espinasse's reports, in days newer than our time, when their want of accuracy was better than it is now, were never quoted without doubt and hesitation; and a special reason was often given as an apology for citing that particular case. Now they are often cited, as if counsel thought them of equal authority with Lord Coke's reports.—

COLLINS, L.J.—That case [Ridley v Sutton] was decided in 1863 and it is very important to see what it did decide. As the law then stood, applications of this kind were regulated by sect 9 of 1 W. 4, c. 22, which provided that the costs of any examination ordered under sect 1 should be costs in the cause unless otherwise directed, either by the judge who made the order for examination, or by the judge before whom the cause might be tried, or by the Court. Now the Court of Exchequer, in dealing with an application under that section arrived at the conclusion, as it seems to me, that the section itself did not apply at all to a case where, in point of fact, the examination so taken was not used at the trial, and therefore they said that the rule of the section—that the costs of the examination were to be costs in the cause—did not apply in such a case, because the examination was not read in evidence. . . . Rightly or wrongly that is the basis of the decision, and I think it was a decision upon the circumstances of that particular case, that the question was not one of discretion at all. The Act did not under the circumstances, allow the discretion or let in the rule that the costs should be costs in the cause. Therefore, in effect, it was a decision refusing to exercise discretion. That was the view taken by the Court of Exchequer, but almost simultaneously there was a case of Duke of Beaufort v Earl of Ashburnham, in the Court of C. P., where that Court took quite a different view of sect. 9, and considered that they undoubtedly had a discretion. . . . Leaving then those authorities as they stand, I come to the rule under the Judicature Act in order to see which of those two authorities should be adopted. Now there are the words of the rule before us—Ord. LXV. i. 27 (29) [the L. J. read the rule].

Now, what is the meaning of that? Surely it makes the standard for consideration, not the event which actually happened, but whether, when the order for examination was applied for, proper prudence was exercised, or whether there was "over-caution, negligence, or mistake." In fact it makes the standard or governing point for consideration the state of things before the legal adviser at the time he makes up his mind. Now the question is, which of these two standards the taxing master should have selected in order to decide whether the costs of this examination were "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice"—the time when, and the circumstances under which the legal adviser had to act, or the circumstances that took place at the trial itself. In my opinion he should have chosen the first alternative. The matter does not rest merely on the rule, because we have a decision of Field, J., since the Judicature Act, 1873, and it appears to me that he has lent the weight of his authority to the construction I am now suggesting. That is in Delarogue v. SS. Oxenholme. That case is very much in point—practically on all four with the present case. . . . The master disallowed the costs of the examination on the ground that it had become unnecessary to use it at the trial. In giving judgment Field, J., said this: "It was said in argument that this was done by reason of a rule that the costs of a proceeding should not be allowed unless it was actually used for some purpose." That looks as if Ridley v Sutton had been brought to the learned judge's attention in the argument. Then he proceeds "I should require to be better satisfied of the propriety of such a rule than I am at present before I acceded to it." That is really an expression of dissent from the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Ridley v Sutton. I think, for the reasons I have given, that the requirements of the rule have been abundantly satisfied, and that we are not fettered by the decision in Ridley v Sutton.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—(After having shortly stated the pleadings, and in particular the objection raised by the replication that the en. sa. was absolutely void, having issued on a judgment more than a year old without a sc. fa., his lordship said.) The plaintiff argues that it is absolutely void for this fault, relying on the language of this Court in Mortimer v Piggott, in which it is so decided. That case, however, did not require the doctrine now called in question, and is actually reported in Adolphus & Ellis without its being laid down. We are now required to consider it, and are satisfied that it is in that respect erroneous.—p. 710.

PARKER, J. (for the Court).—This Court decided [Chaston v Gibbs] that the 10th section of the Bankruptcy Act affected the operation of the writ, and did not merely direct the application of the money levied under it, and that the sheriff was a wrongdoer in acting contrary to the statutory direction coupled with the direction of the writ. We never held the writ to be void as the Court of Queen's Bench seems to have supposed, in Graham v Witherby, . . . and from that they deduced the consequence that it was void altogether, and so the defendant's writ in that case was therefore the first valid writ. We never meant to say more than that the sheriff in disobeying the writ, and the clauses in the Act of Parliament directing its operation, was dealing wrongfully with the goods which, but for the writ, would be the property of the assignees, and therefore responsible in an action of trover. We cannot, therefore, consider that either of these cases bind us as authorities—p. 278.

CAVE, J.—These cases, however, are not applicable to the case now under discussion, first, because in these cases there was a subsequent sale by the sheriff which was invalidated by the express words of the section, "no creditor shall avail himself" of such execution; and secondly, because, if the first execution was void, the subsequent one, having been executed by seizure before the fiat, was within the execution contained in the 10th section. In this case, on the contrary, there are no words in sect. 46, sub-sect. 2, which invalidate the sale by the sheriff, and indeed under that clause the sale must necessarily take place before it can be known whether the execution creditor will or will not ultimately be entitled to the proceeds; and secondly, the words of the statute do seem to imply that the benefit of the execution is to be transferred from the execution creditor to the trustee for the benefit of the creditors generally.

ESHER, M.R.—The learned judge who tried the case, being of opinion that nothing indorsed on the back of the writ, whether written by the execution creditor himself or his solicitor, can be a direction to the sheriff, gave judgment for the defendant. . . . Is that view sound? It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that it is not sound; and in support of that contention Jarman v. Hooper has been cited. But it is said by the defendant's counsel that this point was not under consideration in Jarman v. Hooper, and that that case is therefore no authority upon the point. It is quite true that all that that case decided as to the liability of the execution creditor was that words written on the back of the writ by the solicitor would bind the client, because the writing was within the scope of the solicitor's authority, but when the case is carefully looked at, it must be seen how closely it resembles that now before us. . . . The only point taken on behalf of the execution creditor was that the indorsement was written by the solicitor and was not authorised by the client, but for all that the Court must have seen the indorsement; it was staring them in the face, and it is plain from the question of Maule, J. during the argument that the question whether the indorsement was a direction or not was present to their minds; and when the Court came to the conclusion that the execution creditor was liable because the solicitor was authorised to make the indorsement, it seems to me that the case is a clear decision that the indorsement was a direction. But then it is said that Jarman v. Hooper is inconsistent with Childers v. Wooler. Now, in Childers v. Wooler the Court of Q. B. could have declined to regard the decision in Jarman v. Hooper as good law, or binding upon them, but it is to be observed that they did not assume to overrule it.

Cockburn, C.J., delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court in Childers v. Wooler, distinguishes Jarman v. Hooper upon two grounds: first, that the indorsement in the latter case was much more specific than that in the case then before the Court, and, secondly, that in Jarman v. Hooper, the defendant, by attending the interpleader summons and insisting that the goods were rightly seized by that act, ratified the seizure, which was for his benefit. I confess I am unable to follow either of these distinctions. I cannot see that the indorsement was more specific in the one case than the other; and as to the ratification, it is plain that, if there was ratification, the matter ratified must have been capable of ratification, in which case the ratification adds nothing and makes no distinction, or if the matter were not capable of being ratified, there could be no ratification, and the distinction falls to the ground. . . . It seems to me that one must take the same view of Jarman v. Hooper which has already been taken by this Court in Smith v. Keal [9 Q. B. D. 349]. . . . Therefore if one of these two cases, Jarman v. Hooper and Childers v. Wooler, is to be overruled, it is not Jarman v. Hooper, and if it is not to be overruled, it appears to me to be in point—pp. 276, 277, 278.

BOWEN, L.J.—"The law," says the Court in Semayne's Case, "abhors the destruction or breaking of any house." The landlord (like the sheriff in a civil suit) could only, therefore, enter by an open door or an open window—per ostia et fenestras. In Penton v. Browne it was indeed held that a sheriff for the purposes of execution might break a barn which was in a field, as distinct from a barn which was parcel of a house, but the Court agreed that if the barn had been adjoining a parcel of the house, it could not lawfully have been broken. The law so laid down in Penton v. Browne as to a sheriff's right with regard to a detached outside barn in a field, appears to me to be a departure from older law. This view, whether right or wrong, was at all events considered in Brown v. Glenn not to be applicable to a landlord's distress. I should (with submission) have myself supposed that the sheriff in a civil suit had no more right to break a detached inclosure than a landlord's bailiff had. In Brown v. Glenn a locked stable door was broken open. The stable was not within the curtilage of the dwelling-house, but nevertheless the Court held that the fact of the stable door being locked of itself rendered the distress unlawful. In so doing they affirmed and followed a far older decision of Hardwicke, L. J., in the Summer Assizes at Exeter, in the year 1735, who held that a padlock put upon a barn's door could not be opened by force to take the corn by way of distress. (Vid. Abi. "Distress," E. 2, 6; cited also in Poult v. Longwell, 2 Wm. S. 284, c., note 2, (4th ed.).) It is a misconception to suppose that an outhouse within the curtilage enjoys less immunity than a disconnected outhouse. Penton v. Browne shows exactly the reverse, and in Ilgan v. Shilcock it seems conceded that the landlord may not break open the outer door of any building whatever. The language of Lord Coke is general to the effect that the landlord may not open gates, nor break down inclosures.—p. 390.

KAY, J., after discussing Penton v. Browne and Brown v. Glenn and Seawall's Case, continued: The case then came before the Court of Q. B. in Hobson v. Thellusson, which was an action against a sheriff for having failed to seize goods under a writ of execution. As reported in the L. J. Reports, Lord Blackburn in that case said: "I do not think that the sheriff's officer was bound to go off at once and take a crowbar to break open the doors, although no doubt that might have been done, as the goods were in a warehouse, and not in a dwelling-house. It does not appear that there was any reason for his being bound to use the utmost possible diligence, he went soon after he received the writ, and on his arrival found that the doors were locked. He was not bound to use more than reasonable diligence. He certainly might have broken the doors open, and have seized the goods." Mr Macaskie pointed out that these words are modified in the report of the case which appears in the Law Reports, and he suggested that Lord Blackburn, when he revised his judgment, intentionally altered this passage. But both reports, when they are read carefully, seem to me to come to the same thing. . . I therefore think that the doctrine laid down in Penton v. Browne was approved of in Hobson v. Thellusson. It was said, however, that it was disapproved of in American Concentrated Milk Corporation v. Hendry. There Bowen, J., after referring to the earlier history of the doctrine of the inviolability of the outer door of a house and its precincts, said: "In Penton v. Browne it was indeed held that a sheriff for purposes of execution might break a barn which was in a field, as distinct from a barn which was parcel of a house, but the Court agreed that if the barn had been adjoining to a parcel of the house, it could not lawfully have been broken. The law so laid down in Penton v. Browne as to a sheriff's rights with regard to a detached outhouse in a field appears to me to be a departure from older law." But he does not say that in his opinion the decision in Penton v. Browne was not law, neither does he suggest that it ought to be overruled.—p. 72.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The defendants are persons entitled to legal remandments in real estate devised to them by this testator and the appellant has obtained a judgment against them, and cannot get his money. The question is whether he can, whilst their interests are reversionary, obtain a sale of their reversionary estates. Having regard to those cases [In re Hamilton (1887) 55 L.J. Ch. 282; 31 Ch. D. 291—C.A.] and In re South and the reasons we have given, it appears to me that we are now asked to do what we have no jurisdiction to do. There is nothing really in the cases cited by Mr. Stevenson which in any way affects that view and though perhaps there are two cases to which he has referred which might at first sight appear to be favourable, the point was not raised. As to those cases, In re Jones and In re Cooper I doubt whether they were decisions upon reversionary interests at all: they are so reported that I cannot tell, and therefore I cannot act upon them.

Taylor*, because at first sight it might seem opposed to our present decision, there being in that case also a power in the trustees to sell the stock and apply the proceeds. But if that case is examined, it will be found to differ essentially from this, for there the deed which was relied on as taking the stock out of the provisions of the Act did not actually transfer the shares, which were already mortgaged, but only rendered it incumbent on the defendant to procure their delivery over to the trustees, that they might execute the trusts of the deed.

WOOD, L.J.—Warburton v. Hill might, if the authorities referred to in Scott v. Lord Hastings had been before me, have been rested on a higher ground than the one I took, namely, on the ground that a charging order against the debtor could not affect property which he had previously assigned. In the course of my judgment I said: "The date to be looked to is not that of obtaining the order non, but, subject to operation of the 15th section as to intermediate charges, the real charge is acquired when the charging order is made absolute." I there used expressions which were not necessary to the decision, and which I am inclined to think erroneous.

MATHEW, J.—The Court of Appeal in Drew v. Willis held that it had no power to set aside a charging order which had been properly made, but in that case there was no appeal against the granting of the charging order. In this case the defendant is appealing against the order making the charging order absolute, and he may be seriously prejudiced if we refuse this application—pp. 171, 172.

Haly v. Barry (supra) and Finney v. Hinde (1879) 48 L. J. Q. B. 275; 4 Q. B. D. 102; 10 L. T. 193, 27 W. R. 413—COCKBURN, C. J. and POLLOCK, B., discussed.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Therefore it is necessary for the application of this Act [the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 14] and for obtaining a charging order that you must have a person against whom a judgment has been entered, and the procedure shows that the person against whom judgment is to be entered is the judgment debtor, who must be in a position to show cause why the charging order should not be made. In other words, he must be alive; and it was settled as long ago as Finney v. Hinde that if you had a charging order sub against a dead man, it was useless, and that you could not convert that into an order absolute. That is all Finney v. Hinde really decided . . . The only case that throws any doubt upon what I am saying, and which is to a certain extent inconsistent with it, is Haly v. Barry. In that case someone had a charging order against the testator. The practice under the Common Law Procedure Act was followed there, and the executor was made a party, and Wood, L.J. and Selwyn, L.J. thought that was equivalent to a judgment against the executor. Whether that was equivalent to it under the old practice or not it is unnecessary to consider; but, be that as it may, the decision was that they would make the order absolute for what it was worth. The L.J. held that if a man had an advantage, the benefit was not to be taken away from him. There was no ground for the injunction in that case, except that put forward by the appellant in that case—that the Court would stop a race between creditors. At the same time I recognise that there are observations in the judgment of Wood, L.J. which make me doubt whether I am quite right in saying that you cannot obtain a charging order against the executor even now, if there is any method of getting judgment against him. I doubt whether there is any method under the present practice, and I am not quite sure whether there was any such method even when the practice of entering a suggestion was in vogue. The result is that this order sub is altogether wrong. There is no precedent for it, and it is an experiment that I certainly hope will not be repeated.—pp. 181, 182.

BULLER, J.—Another thing to be observed in the case in Comyns is, that it was decided on the authority of a case in Roll. Abr. 919, which it is there said was never denied. From that circumstance, I am inclined to think it passed without much consideration. For the doctrine in Roll. Abr. is contradicted in 2 Lev. 90, and 1 Lev. 158 and 236. . . . It seems, therefore, strange that the Chief Justice should have said in that case that the case in Roll. Abr. had never been doubted; because these cases determined the reverse of the doctrine there contained.—p. 131.

MALINS, V.-C.—It is very true that it was formerly held in this case, that where a power of sale was given by an executor upon a mortgage, the title under that power of sale could not be forced upon a purchaser. That case I had asserted by Lord St. Leonards (Sugden V. P., p.
890, n. c. 14) as an authority. But I think (and indeed the learned counsel for the defendant has not disputed it) that the doctrine laid down in that case can be no longer maintained as the rule of the Court, for in Russell v Plance (supra), the M.R. decided directly the contrary, namely, that a good title could be made under a power of sale created by an executor. That case of Russell v Plance having been cited before the L.C. and the L.J.J. in Vane (Earl) v Rigden (supra), was commented upon by the L.C., who expressed his approbation of it, and I therefore think it may be considered as an authority upon relied upon. In that case the Court dissolved an interlocutory injunction, which had been granted on the application of a creditor of a testator, to restrain a creditor of the executor from selling the testator's leaseholds under an execution for his own debt. The point was not finally determined, but the Court thought the circumstances were such as to raise an inference of a gift by the testator's creditor to the executor. When another case arises in that form I shall follow

Nugent v. Gifford and Mead v. Orerry (Lord) (supra), questioned.
Wilson v. Moore (1883) 1 Myl. & K. 337, 36 R. R. 272

BROGHAM, L.C.—The cases which have always been considered as going farthest in protecting the party dealing with an executor are Nugent v. Gifford and Mead v. Orerry (Lord). It is, however, impossible to read the argument of Lord Hardwicke in each of these decisions without being satisfied that he considered the knowledge of the executor's misappropriation as not distinctly brought home to the party. That there was notice of the representative character is clear, and that there was notice of the executor dealing with testamentary assets we may also admit; nevertheless, the whole argument appears to assume that the party dealing with the executor might suppose the executor had a right so to dispose of the property. "A purchaser from an executor," he says, "has no power of knowing the debts of the testator." Again, "If you can follow the property into the hands of the assignee, this would be saying that no man could have an assignment from executors without coming into the Court of Chancery to have an account how he has distributed the assets of his testator." But there can be no doubt that subsequent decisions are difficult if not impossible to be reconciled with these two cases. What Lord Hardwicke lays down in Nugent v. Gifford would probably not have been so stated if Pare v. Newman (supra) had then been decided. Lord Kenyon had at the Rolls, in Janney v. Ridgard (supra), expressed himself as strongly of opinion that Mead v. Orerry (Lord) went too far, and he held that, though a person purchasing from an executor is not bound to see to the application of the money, yet that the purchaser taking with the knowledge that the money was to be misapplied, had no protection. Lord Thurlow in Scott v. Tyler (supra), says, that Nugent v. Gifford cannot be reconciled with Crane v. Drake (supra). And Lord Thurlow is known to have formed an opinion clearly against the bankers in Scott v. Tyler, though the matter was compromised. It is quite clear from what Lord Eldon says in the elaborate judgment in W. Lord v. Drummond (supra), where he minutely examined all the cases, that he considered Janney v. Ridgard to have shaken Nugent v. Gifford and Mead v. Orerry, in so far as these cases may be supposed to establish any general principle—p. 355. And see post.

JESSEL, M.R.—The only remaining point is what period of time is sufficient to raise a presumption that the debts have been paid. Now upon that point, and upon that point only, I differ from Sabin v Heape. I think it is clear that ten years and a-half are not sufficient, but, as has been said, the line must be drawn somewhere. The question is where? In Sabin v Heape, the late M.R. held that the lapse of twenty-seven years did not raise the presumption. I think that period too long. In Forbes v Peacock (supra, col. 1064) the period was twenty-five years, which the V.-C. appears to have considered too long—p. 450. His lordship also referred to Boiley v Bailey (supra, col. 1062) and Stroughill v Anstey (supra, col. 1061).

BRETT, L.J.—Now, it seems to me that a reasonable and fair general rule of construction may be deduced from the decided cases, and that this rule is well stated in Hartland v Marrell (supra, col. 1062). There the M.R. says, "I am of opinion that when a testator bequeaths all his real estate to his executors and directs them to pay all his debts, that constitutes a charge on the real estate, although they take no beneficial interest in it." Upon hearing those two cases read [Wase v. Medington (supra, col. 1062), and Hartland v. Marrell], it seemed to me that you might extract from them a very good rule, viz., that where a gift is in the form mentioned in Hartland v. Marrell, the debts are charged upon the real estate, unless upon other parts of the will a contrary intention clearly appears. The rule, as stated in Hartland v. Marrell, with that proviso on condition attached to it, seems to me to be consistent with the authorities, and to be well stated in the passage from Boiley v. Bailey, which was read by the M.R.—p. 452. HOLKER, J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—The question whether the rule thus laid down [that where executors in whom real estate is vested for a legal estate in fee simple subject to a charge of debts are selling, a purchaser is not bound or entitled to inquire whether debts remain unpaid unless twenty years have elapsed from the testator's death] ought to be applied to the case of executors selling leaseholds arose in Whistler, In re. . . although the facts in that case are different from those which occur in the present, and although there the contract was entered into within twenty years of the testator's death, it appears to me to be an express decision that the rule in question is not applicable to the case of an executor selling leaseholds. It is said however that this decision conflicts with . . . Molynson and White, In re (supra), a case which was not cited in Whistler, In re. In my opinion those decisions were not based upon the rule in question. The L.C. of Ireland, in giving the judgment of the C.A., says "There is potent evidence that the debts have, as a matter of fact, been paid. . . . The V.C. came to the conclusion that there was clear evidence before him that the debts were paid, and that the vendors were violating the trusts reposed in them. . . . We do not decide as to the limit of twenty years" (by which I understand the period fixed as the limit in Tanqueray-Walker and Landan, In re (supra) to be referred to), "but we think that the order of the V.C. was right, and that the vendors, not being able to say that there were debts still due, had no right to sell." That case seems to have been decided upon evidence that the debts had been paid, and that the executors who were selling were acting as trustees and not as executors. . . . [His lordship then discussed Corser v. Cartwright, and continued.] It appears to me that I have the high authority of Lord Cairns and Lord Cranworth [in Corser v. Cartwright] for saying that where a person who fills the position of an executor is found selling or mortgaging part of his testator's estate, he is to be presumed to be acting in the discharge of the duties imposed on him as executor, unless there is something in the transaction which shows the contrary; and, further, that the contrary is not made out merely from the circumstance that the conveyance or mortgage does not purport to be executed by him in that capacity.—p. 306—309

ROMER, L.J. (for self, RIGBY and COLLINS, L.J.)

—As a rule, the Court has no jurisdiction to give, and will not give, its sanction to the performance by trustees of acts with reference to the trust estate which are not on the face of the instrument creating the trust authorised by its terms. Crawshaw, In re . . . and Morrison, In re . . . are instances where the Court was asked to sanction steps to be taken by trustees which it thought unjustifiable, and which it declared it had no jurisdiction to authorise. But in the management of a trust estate, and especially where that estate consists of a business or shares in a mercantile company, it is not infrequently happens that some peculiar circumstance arises for which provision is not expressly made by the trust instrument, and which renders it most desirable, and it may be very essential for the benefit of the estate, and in the interest of all the cestui que trust, that certain acts should be done by the trustees, which in ordinary circumstances they would have no power to do. In a case of this kind, which may reasonably be supposed to be one not foreseen or anticipated by the author of the trust, where the trustees are embarrassed by the emergency that has arisen, and the duty cast upon them to do what is best for the estate, and the consent of all the beneficiaries cannot be obtained by reason of some of them not being in jure or in existence, then it may be right for the Court, and the Court in a proper case would have jurisdiction, to sanction on behalf of all concerned such acts on behalf of the trustees as we have above referred to.—p. 718.

BYRNE, J.—In reference to the reports of that case [Loome v. Stothard], which is stated with more detail in the Law Journal than in Simons & Stuart, I find that there were two points argued. The first point was a very important one, the judgment deciding that a devisee had a right to retain a debt due to himself or to his trustees out of the produce of the estate devised to him, the other point being as to the costs of the administration—namely, whether they should come out of the estate in priority to the debt or not. . . The case has not got into any of the text-books to which I have before referred as being an authority for the proposition for which it is cited, nor is there any case in which it has been followed as deciding such a question. I have not, therefore, the same difficulty as if I had to deal with an old-established authority on a particular point. In any event I should have thought myself bound by the decision of the C. A. in Dunning, In re, but, as I have said, I do not think that Loome v. Stothard is an authority for the proposition for which it is now invoked—namely, that a tenant for life est dedit que tenet is entitled to retain where there are trustees competent to sue for the corpus of the fund.—p. 157

WICKENS, V.-C.—There is a difficulty created by Hall v. Macdonald, but I am bound to say that for a great many years I have thought that case was not law. I remember making a note against it when it was first reported. I have no doubt whatever that Shadwell, V.-C.'s decision was right, but I cannot help thinking that Mr. Simons has misconceived the precise point of the case. In fact, he did not report the case for that point. It is mentioned incidentally, and one can easily conceive certain states of circumstances in which the decision would have been perfectly right without that expression having been necessary, or having been used. It seems to me that this case is, in fact, settled by principle, and that principle is so well established that I may venture to depart even from so great an authority as Shadwell, V.-C. There is no doubt as to the right of retainer against legal assets. There is also, I think, such a preponderance of authority in favour of holding assets like these to be equitable assets, that, notwithstanding the decision in Lovegrove v. Cooper, I may so hold.—p. 791

COTTON, L.J.—I at first felt some difficulty about . . . Ferguson v. Gibson, but in my opinion that decision was quite right. There an estate was devised to a mother for life, and to the daughter after her death. The V.-C. determined that the widow, who was a surety for the testator by specialty in which the heirs were bound (and if she had paid off the debt would have had a right to the benefit of the specialty), not having paid it off, could only be treated as a simple contract creditor, and had no right of retainer; but that her daughter, who was entitled as devisee in remainder (not as devisee in trust for sale or subject to a charge of debts, but a devisee for her own benefit) and was a creditor by specialty in which the heirs were bound, was entitled to retain. That, in my opinion, was quite right, upon the ground I have expressed, that in the case of a specialty creditor where the heirs are bound, the common law right of action against the heir, by which priority may be gained, is not taken away, whereas a simple contract creditor can only obtain a judgment as against the real estate for the benefit of himself and all the other creditors.—p. 482. BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I will only add that Hall v. Macdonald is not to be relied upon as being any

There is no reference to this Act of Parliament [3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104] in the report, and we are not told whether the devise was in trust for sale, or what the circumstances were. The decision may have been right, but the absence of facts makes it useless as an authority.—p. 484

KAY, J.—At first sight the decision in Williams, In re, seems to be analogous to the present case, but upon examination there is a considerable distinction. The judgment creditor was no longer a simple contract creditor, but had obtained a higher right than simple contract creditors in the distribution of assets, and the effect of placing specialty creditors for the purpose of distribution on the same level was not necessarily to put them after the judgment creditor. But here the executrix who desires to retain is only a simple contract creditor, and the law that she cannot retain against specialty creditors remains, unless the statute must be read that for this purpose, among others, the specialty creditors are of equal degree with the simple contract creditors. . . . I cannot help the conclusion that the Act (32 &

38 Vict. c. 46) having augmented the fund for payment of simple contract creditors, has to this extent enlarged the right of retainer. In this respect I agree with Pearson, J.'s decision in Wilson v. Cornwall,—pp. 446, 447.

STIRLING, J.—In Williams, In re, the question arose how the position of such a judgment creditor [a simple contract creditor who had obtained judgment] was affected by the Act of 1869 [Indo Palmer's Act], and it was held by Wickens, V.-C., that he was entitled to be paid in priority to both specialty and simple contract creditors. . . . That case, so far as I know, stands alone in the Reports. The other class of cases relates to the right of retainer on the part of a legal personal representative in respect of a debt due to him from the deceased; a right which can only be exercised in preference to creditors of equal degree. With reference to this right it has been decided in . . . Wilson v. Cowxell, Jones, In re, and Briggs, In re, that the assets must, in the first place, be divided rateably between specialty and simple contract creditors, and that effect is to be given to the right of retainer in respect of the simple contract debt due to the legal personal representative only out of the portion coming to the simple contract creditors. The grounds for the decision are thus stated by Kay, J. in Jones, In re. . . . I understand Williams, In re, to be there distinguished, because after the death of the testator the creditor had recovered judgment, and had thus attained a higher rank than he had at the time of the death. It is also distinctly laid down that the object of the Act of 1869 is "only to take away the priority of a specialty creditor over simple contract creditors, not to give any of them priority over him." I am not sure that Wickens, V.-C. took the same view.—p. 360

NORTH, J.—There is no case in which any distinction has been drawn between the right of retainer and the right of preference. In Tillot v. Fryer (1878) 9 Ch. D. 568, 27 W. R. 148—M.R., it was pointed out that both these rights depend on the same principle. In Williams' Estate, In re (supra), the point did not really arise, but in Jones, In re, Calver v. Laxton, Briggs, In re (supra), and Wilson v. Cornwall (supra) (though not fully argued) the point was decided as to retainer; and in Bentnick, In re (supra), the same principle was applied to the priority of a simple contract Crown debtor. I cannot decide in favour of the defendant's contention without going directly in the teeth of these decisions. It is said that I ought to follow Orsmond, In re. I have, however, to choose, between that case and another of uniformly consistent authorities to the contrary dealing with the right of retainer. The case, as reported, is short, and not quite intelligible. The learned judge is reported to have said, "Cases have been cited to show that there has been some alteration in an executor's right of retainer." Now the report does not mention the names of the cases cited in support of that proposition, and none of them have been cited to me.—p. 244.

KEKEWICH, J.—I understand the principle of Richmond v. White to be that where money is paid into Court for convenience of administration the executor's right of retainer is not interfered with; but where that result follows not from convenience of administration, but because the executor is not a proper person to receive it, and the Court has appointed its own officer in his place, then his right is ousted, but so long as he is in possession of his legal rights as administrator, though under the control of the Court, he is not to lose his right of retainer. It is also said that he must be taken to have waived his right, and that argument is put on the ground that the parties were not aware of his rights. The answer to that is the answer given in Richmond v. White, namely, that it is not necessary to expressly reserve the right or to express that the order is made without prejudice to the right.—p. 362.

KEKEWICH, J.—In that case [Campbell, Ex parte] the question was as to a right of retainer apart from a right of proof, but the right which the V.C. says may be lost, forfeited, or released may be either a right of retainer or a right of proof, and he says the judge who decided Player v. Porchall (col 1071) thought that in that case the claim of the heir to retain was made too late. I should decide the present case in the same way as Player v. Porchall if I were satisfied that the right had been lost, forfeited, or released, but I see nothing of the kind. . . . Then it is said that he [the applicant] has no right until he has established his debt, and for that the respondents rely on Harrison, In re. I confess I thought that the law was clearly settled—certainly it is engrafted in my legal mind by Niel v. Smith and by Erignau v. Gibson (col 1070). If Pearson, J. decided against or declined to follow these authorities, I should feel a difficulty, but it seems to me that he did nothing of the kind. In the first place, neither case was cited to him. The arguments did not go to this particular point. The judgment was a considered one, but Pearson, J. did not touch this particular point. What he doubts his mind to is that there was nothing due to the executrix before he was called on to pay. There is no debt in that sense, it is an equitable debt. . . . therefore the learned judge was correct in saying there was nothing due to him. . . . and then he directs his mind to the question whether there could be a right of retainer, saying that there were no assets, no money in his hands at the time the death matured—p. 121.

WRIGHT, J.—That case [Woodward v. Darcy] is mentioned in Williams on Executors (5th edition) p. 568, with approval. . . . I doubt whether it is the law now that the property in the assets is absolutely altered without showing assent or appropriation by the executor. . . . But here the assets are of much less value than her [i.e., the executrix] debt and it seems to me, in the absence of authority that it would be unreasonable to hold that she was bound to go through the form of selling before she could pay herself. There is no authority that she ought, except the statement in Chapman v. Turner, as reported in 9 Mod 268. But that report is most unsatisfactory, and does not accord with the same case as reported in Viner's Abridgment, Executor, D. 2, p. 71, which is the only report referred to in Williams on Executors. In the absence of such authority, therefore, I think I ought not to hold that the executrix is bound to realise before she can exercise her right to retain. My judgment is confined to the case where the value of the whole of the assets is less than the debt due to the executrix.—p. 231.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, SIR P. JENNINGS and ROMER, L.J.).—It is not denied that she [the executrix] had a right to retain and might have exercised it before the order [for administration in bankruptcy of the debtor's estate] was made, or, to be more accurate, before she knew that an application for such an order had been made Gilbert, Ex parte (supra, col 1073). But it is contended that, as she had not exercised her right before that date, she could not do so afterwards. The older common law authorities go far to show that if an executor was a creditor of his deceased testator, and had assets in his hands sufficient to pay his debt (and all others of a higher degree, if any), such debt was treated as extinguished. . . . Blackstone says so distinctly (vol 3, p. 18). His words are "So much as is sufficient to answer his own demand is, by operation of law, applied to that particular purpose." Plowden goes further, and says that the property in the assets is changed—see Woodward v. Darcy. But this can only be true if the assets spoken of can be identified and appropriated to the debt which they have satisfied, and this presupposes the exercise of the right in fact; and in the case in Plowden it had been so exercised—see p. 181. Woodward v. Darcy was as follows: Luttrell was the obligor, and Woodward, the plaintiff, was obligee. Windham was Luttrell's executor, but Windham was dead, and his executors were the defendants. Windham was a creditor of Luttrell, and had retained assets sufficient to pay himself, leaving nothing for Woodward. The debts were all specialty debts, and it was held that the defendants were entitled to judgment. Until the executor does some act to show which assets he retains, it is obvious that the property in them cannot be changed. This had been noticed before in Gilbert, Ex parte, and Wentworth's Office of Executors, cited in the margin of Plowden, p. 166. But it was settled that an executor sued by a creditor could give a retainer by himself in satisfaction of his own debt in evidence under a general plea of plene administravit, and that he need not plead a retainer specially—1 Wms Saunders, p. 833, n. 6. The extent to which the doctrine that his debt was carried is further illustrated by the cases collected in Williams on Executors (5th edition), vol. 2, p. 1180. . . . It is quite plain from these authorities that the executor's right to retain assets in his hands was as against him treated as enforced as soon as he could properly enforce it. . . . It is true that an executor with a right of retainer has not all the rights of a secured creditor—see Lee v. Nuttall (supra, col. 1074).

His right extends both in law and in equity to all legal assets which he has in his hands, and there is nothing in sect. 126 [Bankruptcy Act, 1883] to deprive him of his right. The judgment of V. Williams, L.J., in Williams, In re (1891) 8 Morr 65, supports this conclusion. Counsel for the appellant relied on authorities collected in Williams on Executors, vol. 1, p. 885, which show that if an executor dies without having exercised his right, his executor cannot exercise it unless he also represents the testator. But whatever difficulty there may be in reconciling these cases with Blackstone's statement above referred to, they are quite consistent with the right of the executrix to retain her debt as against the trustee claiming her testator's assets. A similar observation applies to Wigram, V.C.'s judgment in Burge v. Brutton. The only person who has a right of retainer is the legal personal representative of the testator; and if such representative is dead, his representative cannot himself first exercise the right unless he also represents the testator—(Wynne, In re (supra, col. 1072). This doctrine has no application to this case. There is no analogy between death and an order for administering assets in bankruptcy under sect. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—per 806, 808.

ROMER, J.—These (Jones v. Evans) the executrix, who claimed the right of retainer, did not represent a dead creditor who had proved in the administration action against the testator's estate, but was a mere legatee under that creditor's will, and nothing more. Of course, as legatee, that executrix had no right to prove for a legacy as if it were a debt, and it was held that she had no legal right to prove for the money. That case did not, in my opinion, differ from, or throw doubt on Nunn v. Barlow (p. 847). It occurred to me that possibly Nunn v. Barlow might prove to have been a case where there was no absolute decree for administration, but only a mere direction for an account; but I find that Nunn v. Barlow was actually a case where a full decree for administration had been made.

And, indeed, in Lee v. Nuttall (supra, col. 1074) James, L.J. pointed out that the right of retainer could not depend upon the right of the legal personal representative to prefer himself to one of the creditors, because, if that had been the doctrine, the right would stop where there was a full decree for an administration. The law was, that a right of retainer remained, although the right to prefer one creditor to another had ceased. It appears to me, therefore, that it is impossible at the present day to impeach Nunn v. Barlow, or the subsequent decisions in which the doctrine as there laid down has been accepted and followed—per 359.

GOLLINS, L.J.—It was decided in that case [Nunn v. Barlow] that, notwithstanding an administration decree, the administrator keeps his right of retainer. . . . The administration bond does this: it writes at large that which is contained in an ordinary administration decree—that is, the obligation to administer rateably and proportionately and according to precedent. . . . If that is conceded, it disposes of that case point upon which Barnes, J. relied in differing from the view of Romer, J. . . . Barnes, J. said that in his view Romer, J. had not sufficiently considered the effect of the words "rateably and proportionately." . . . In my opinion, the decision of Romer, J. is simply justified by the previous decisions, and the opinion of Barnes, J. cannot be sustained.—per 476.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—This is a very different case from Dicken, Ex parte, where Lord Eldon held that the proof of a debt under a commission of bankruptcy by a trustee did not deprive the cestui que trust of a lien which they previously had in respect of the debt. CRITTY, J.—No doubt the law is settled in the case of a specific devise—that is a matter which lies outside the duties of executors, and a set-off is impossible. It is equally plain, on the authorities, in the case of a specific gift of leaseholds, that the rule laid down in Akerman v. Akerman extends to every gift of specific chattels. But if the proposition there is made as a universal one, that in no case of a specific gift can there be a right of retainer, then I am unable to assent to it, to do so would be to narrow the doctrine unnecessarily.—p. 188.

NORTH, J.—Willes v. Greenhill (col. 1080) and Akerman, In re, show quite clearly that the executor would be entitled to retain the debt from the son. Courtenay v. Williams and Akerman, In re (supra), show that the lapse of time from the son's bankruptcy in 1859, or from the realisation of the security in 1869, both upwards of twenty years ago, would not affect their right to retain. . . . In each of these cases [Cherry v. Boulthée and Hodgson, In re] the bankruptcy took place in the life-time of the testator, and the ground of the decision was that the executors were never entitled to the debt, but only to a dividend upon it. These facts are quite different from the facts in the present case. In the present case no one ever proved against the bankrupt's estate. . . . There [Oopen, In re, col. 1079] the creditor had not proved, but there was a composition deed to which he had not assented, but to which the proper majority had assented, so that the composition became binding on all the creditors, whether assenting or not; and he being bound by the composition deed was in the same position as if he had proved; and that being so, it was held that there could be no retainer. Another case which was cited in support of the contention that there was no right of retainer is Rees, In re. . . . The testator had proved in his life-time against a bankrupt to whom he had left a legacy, but the debt due on the proof was suspended by statute till after the date when the legacy was payable. It was held that the executors could not retain a legacy payable in presentis in respect of a debt that would not become payable until a future date. That case is, therefore, quite distinguishable from the present [His Lordship then discussed Whitehouse, In re, and continued.] Then the same thing is laid down by Lord Chelmsford in Summers v. Elliott (supra, col. 1078) just as clearly. It is true that in that case it was a dictum merely, because there the executor had proved. Those two cases are, I think, in point—p. 554.

BUCKLEY, J.—The cases are numerous in which it has been held that executors and trustees have power to appropriate personal estate under such circumstances as arise in this case. For instance, in Elliott v Kemp appropriation of furniture, in Barclay v Owen, appropriation of a mortgage debt, in Richardson, In re, appropriation of stock in a brewery company, in Brooks, In re, appropriation of shares in a brewery company; in Nickels, In re, appropriation of stock; and in Waters, In re, appropriation of mortgages and other securities, were all held to be valid. . . There was no trust for conversion in Elliott v Kemp, or in Richardson, In re, or in Barclay v Owen (supra). In each of the other cases there was a trust for conversion. Counsel have not referred me to, and I have not found any case relating to appropriation of chattels real. The question I have to determine is whether under circumstances such as these a valid appropriation can be made of chattels real—p. 297. at all times to a decision of Sir W. Grant. but I think one may safely say it goes to the very outside of the doctrine, as that will was construed not to imply any trust whatever, especially having regard to the word "direction," which was there used. Lord Cottenham does not appear to have been altogether satisfied with Gibbs v Rumsey, and I apprehend no case would be decided according to it, where the gift was not precisely and distinctly in the words there mentioned, "to trustees and executors, to be disposed of in such manner as they in their discretion shall think proper."—pp. 1096, 1097.

VAUGHAN, B.—The duties of Holt, C.J. [“If A. employs B. to work for C., A. is liable to pay for it. An executor is not liable to pay for funeral expenses unless he contracts for them.”], is expressly at variance with the opinion of Lord Ellenborough [in Tugwell v. Heyman], and, were it necessary, I should feel no difficulty in assenting to the latter authority, but it is not necessary to draw any comparison between the two cases, because, from the note of the former it does not appear under what circumstances that opinion was delivered. The latter is a case precisely applicable to the present, acquiesced in by the counsel, and confirmed, if confirmation were required, by the opinion of the C.J. of the C.P. I consider the burden of the debt to be a clear obligation upon the executor, and think that he is liable for the expenses incurred, if in his absence that duty be performed for him by another.—p. 37

said: There has been delivered at the bar before me an argument to the effect that Kay, J.'s judgment [in Marsden, In re] was based upon an erroneous proposition—namely, that the executor was a trustee for creditors—and therefore it was said it was in substance an erroneous decision. From the report it would appear that the learned judge spoke of the executor as a trustee.

I think it is quite immaterial whether Kay, J. did, or did not, call the executor a trustee. The language I prefer myself using is, that he owes a duty to the creditors, both at law and in equity, to administer the estate according to the well-established principles. . . . In Gale, In re the V.-C. . . expressed himself thus: “Upon the authorities, and also upon the well settled rule of law, if you sue upon a devastavit, that is personal against the executor, and is barred by the six years.” I think he there enunciated the law correctly, and whether these may not have been some slight misapplication of the law in regard to the facts of the case and the mode in which it was shaped against the executors, it is quite unnecessary for me to inquire. I do not look upon that case as any authority that justifies the proposition that the executor, when simply sued as such, and simply charged with what he has received, and not sued, therefore, upon any devastavit at all can set up his own wrong, and then plead the statute by way of defence founded on his own wrong—p. 782

5. EXECUTOR DE SON TORT.

Curtis v. Vernon (1790) 3 Term Rep. 587, 2 H. Bl. 18; 1 R. R. 774.

KENYON, C.J.—The case in 1 Sud. 76 is reported in a confused manner; but it coincides with saying "that an executor de son tort cannot pay himself." Now that goes the length of deciding the present case.—p. 569.

PARKIN, B. (for the Court).—All the authorities on this subject were considered by the Court of C. P. in Tharpe v. Stallwood, and some are also to be found in 2 Roll Abr. tit. "Trespas per Relation." In that case, the Court determined that trespass was maintainable, under the circumstances, by the administrator, the reason for which relation is given by Rolle, C.J. in Long v. Hebb (1662) Styles 341, that otherwise there would be no remedy for the wrong done.—p. 90.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The only matter adduced by the defendant's counsel, which is in the least in his favour, is what fell from the Court of K. B. in Kirack v. Burges, and which turns out to have been a mere dictum, although, no doubt, the judges entertained that view of the question. But the modern authorities are opposed to the defendant's arguments, and, amongst other cases, that of Hodley v. Clark may be cited.—p. 306.

WOOD, V.-C.—How is a man, who has improperly got the property of a testator into his hands, to purge himself, except by putting it into the hands of the person who has a right to it? And if that be so, on what principle can it be said that, because there are matters of account, a suit must be brought in order to settle them? I confess I cannot see why. Then it is said that Lord Cottenham has decided otherwise in Carmichael v. Carmichael. But the remarks of Lord Cottenham were not requisite for the decision of the case, it was a dictum, and in these terms (p. 103)—"How can you distinguish this case from one in which there are two executors, and one dies, and his representative accounts for his receipts with the survivor? That does not discharge him from the liability to account in a suit for the administration of the estate, and the authorities show that an executor de son tort cannot say he is so against those who charge him as executor. He has all the liabilities, but none of the privileges that belong to that character." Now, I have considered that dictum with the respect that is due to so high an authority, and I confess I cannot follow the reasoning by which his lordship arrived at that conclusion. It is plain that an executor cannot discharge himself by accounting to his co-executor, because he is himself authorised, and it is his duty, to see how the assets are applied. When he has paid over the assets he is not discharged, he must see to their application. If he charged, he must see to part with possession of the assets to his co-executor, though he is not answerable for his co-executor's receipts, he is responsible for what he so pays over. But it may well be asked, what right have you to proceed against a man who has had wrongful possession of property; if he have discharged his duty by making it over to the executor? What claim have you to say, "You shall not be discharged by the rightful owner, but we will unite all you have done, and bring a suit against you in respect of this property?" That is not the rule at law, it is clear, for an executor de son tort who pays over what he has received to the rightful owner before action brought is at once discharged. And I apprehend the rule here must be the same.—p. 97.

His lordship then discussed Sharland v. Mildon (supra), Hopper v. Summersett, Kenrich v. Burges (supra), and Endor v. Bates (supra)

[It was submitted in argument by Field, Q.C., that "if the executors named in a will intermeddle with the goods of the deceased before taking out probate they can be sued as executors de son tort, and it follows that their agents can also be sued. This was expressly held in Sharland v. Mildon, it as appears from the report in the Law Journal, the widow of the testator was named executrix in his will"]

BOVILL, C.J.—It is true that executors may be sued as executors by reason of their intermeddling with the goods of their testator before probate, and an executor so circumstanced appears in Webster v. Webster to have been called an executor de son tort; but this cannot have been intended to imply that he was a wrongdoer. It is clear that a person acting for an executor who has proved the will cannot be treated as an executor de son tort, and several cases show that the same is the case if he has not proved the will. This seems to have been assumed in Hopper v. Summersett and Cottle v. Aldrich. In the case of an intestacy, if a person who is subsequently appointed administrator intermeddles with the goods before obtaining letters of administration, according to Padgett v. Priest (supra), both he and any agent employed by him may be treated as executors de son tort, but even this appears from Hill v. Curtis (supra) to be subject to some limitation. Sharland v. Mildon has been especially pressed upon us, the facts of that case do not very distinctly appear, but it is clear that the widow was there treated as a wrongdoer.—p. 117.

M. SMITH, J. to the same effect.
BRETT, J.—Sharland v. Mildon would, I think, be wrongly decided if it really bore the interpretation put upon it by Mr. Field.—p. 119.
[In note 2 to p. 115 of Sykes v. Sykes (L. R. 5 C. P.) it will be seen that an examination of the solicitors' papers in Sharland v. Mildon showed that the widow was not appointed executrix by the testator in either of the two wills left by him.]

TURNER, L.J. (after discussing the earlier cases said): It is not until we come to Baynon v. Gollins that I find any doubt suggested as to the liability of the wife surviving; but in that case Lord Thurlow appears to have held that she was not liable, for I think, that, looking at the fact of that case, as appearing in the note to Mr. Eden's edition of Brown's reports, it can hardly be doubted, notwithstanding the different report of the case by Dickens, that it was so held by Lord Thurlow; although looking to the frame of the suit, I find the greatest possible difficulty in reconciling his lordship's view on that point with the decree which appears to have been made. Whatever weight, however, might have been due to this opinion of Lord Thurlow seems to me to be removed by the masterly exposition of the law upon the subject, which is to be found in Lord Redesdale's judgment in Adair v. Shaw and by the authorities which are referred to in that judgment; to which it may be added that the analogy to the case of trover, on which Lord Thurlow seems to have relied, seems to be answered by Bellew v. Scott (supra), which does not appear to have been cited in the argument before him. Upon the authorities, therefore, speaking with all respect to the V.-C., I think that the declaration contained in this decree cannot be supported, and I am confirmed in this opinion by that of Sir E. V. Williams [Williams on Executors, 5th ed. vol. ii. p. 1667], to whom a higher authority upon such a point as this could not possibly be found. His opinion is most decidedly in favour of Lord Redesdale's view.—p. 788. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J. concurred.

ROMILLY, M R—Downe (Viscount) v. Morris alone appears to militate against Burgess v Wheate, and if followed it would affect or qualify that decision, unless it meant merely to establish the proposition, which would be new, viz., that if a term of years is vested in a tenant, and subject to that term the reversion in fees is vested in another, if the tenant should mortgage his term and die without heirs and next of kin, then that in every such case the reversion of the fee would be entitled to redeem the mortgage of the term. The V.C., however, in deciding that case, expressly admits the authority of Burgess v Wheate, and considers that it did not affect the case then before him.—p 712.

JAMES, L.J.—The V.C. proceeded entirely upon Carter v Sanders, a decision of Kindersley, V.C., no doubt entitled to great respect, as every decision of that learned judge is. But that decision was pronounced in very few words and without reference to Baine, Ex parte, which had been decided previously by the Court of Bankruptcy, a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, . . . in the present case Hall, V.C. says, not only he takes that case as an authority binding on him, which no doubt it was, but that as Hall found its way into the text-books, he might possibly be disturbing titles and the holdings of property if he were now to overrule it. I am bound to say I have been considering the thing all through the argument, and I cannot conceive the possibility of any disturbance of title arising from the overruling of that case. I can conceive the case of persons not being able to make title as easily and satisfactorily as they otherwise could by reason of that case being in the way, but I cannot conceive of any person having ever obtained a title based on it. Therefore I think we are not in any way governed by that case, nor to be deterred from the independent consideration of the present case by reason of the time which has elapsed since that decision was pronounced by Kindersley, V.C., without it having been questioned, except by a very short and clear expression of opinion by Lord Chelmsford, certainly not necessary for the decision of the case then before him (Coope v Fryerwell) upon the very same point.—p 699.

STUART, V-C [who dissented from the opinion that the Wills Act does away with the rule that every devise of land, whether in particular or general terms, is necessarily specific].—There is no other distinction in regard to a residuary devise contained in a will, not within the operation of the Wills Act, and one within its operation than this, that that Act makes a will within its operation speak from the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention appears —p. 178

CALINS, L.C.—There is nothing in the Act (1 Vict. c. 26) to alter the well-settled rule of law as to the effect of a residuary devise when you know the time at which it was made, namely, that for the purpose of payment of debts it is to rank pari passu with the specific devises. Then, with regard to the authorities, it appears that Kindersley, V-C and the late M.R. took a different view from that which I have expressed, and Stuart, V-C, and Hall, V-C, and Lord Hatherley, when V-C, took the opposite view. But I feel bound to say that I look upon Hensman v. Fryer, decided by Lord Chelmsford, as a direct decision on this particular point. It was a most carefully considered judgment, and was a distinct expression of opinion by the judge who was then at the head of this Court, that the Wills Act had made no alteration in the law in this respect —p. 141

JAMES, L.J.—I well recollect the decision of Lord Chelmsford in Hensman v. Fryer, and the extent to which it was canvassed at the time, and I was never able to see what answer could be made to the principle on which he based his judgment, namely, that the Wills Act said that the will must be construed as if it had been made just before the testator's death, and the Court had only to consider what would have been the consequence if it had been so made. But, independently of that, I think that the decision of Lord Chelmsford is binding upon the other branches of the Court. It was a decision deliberately pronounced for the purpose of settling the differences which existed between the various branches of the Court, and I think it ought to have been treated as settling the question —p. 142.

MALINS, V-C.—It is urged upon me that the decision in Hensman v. Fryer has been recognised by the C.A. as a binding authority in Lancefield v. Iggulden, and that I must, therefore, follow it in the present case. The point now raised, however [whether, where the residuary personal estate of the testator is insufficient for the payment of his debts, pecuniary legatees and the residuary devisee will be called upon to contribute rateably to make up the deficiency], was not in question in Lancefield v. Iggulden and I think I am still at liberty to decide this case as I decide Dugdale v. Dugdale. Being of opinion, therefore, that the rule in Hensman v. Fryer as to contribution is not correct, I must continue to follow the old rule.—p. 627

HALL, V-C—I am of opinion that it must be considered settled that pecuniary legacies must be devised to before real estate for payment of the debts of the testator. The decisions in Collins v. Lewis and Tomkins v. Colthurst are in accordance with the decision of Lord Chelmsford in Mitcham v. Scarfe (supra, col. 1091), and I shall follow them. I do not consider that in so doing I am acting in opposition to the authority of the C.A. in Lancefield v. Iggulden.—p. 111

[Hensman v. Fryer was entirely relied on by the plaintiffs, but Hall, V-C, in deciding against them made no special reference to the case. See, however, the argument.]

HALL, V.-C.—Simmons v. Rose certainly is the strongest authority in favour of the general proposition that where there is a direction to convert the converted fund must be applicable for payment of legacies or debts, as the case may be, which are not directly ordered to be paid out of that common fund. But the L. C., in giving judgment on the second occasion, seems to have felt on looking into the authorities that it was necessary, if I may say so, to advert in rather a marked and special manner to the fact, which existed in that case of the property being directed to be treated as part of the personal estate of the testator—p. 636.

Trott v. Buchanan (1885) 54 L. J. Ch. 678, 25 Ch. D. 449; 52 L. T. 248; 83 W. R. 339.

PEARSON, J.—The statement of the facts of that case (French v. Chichester) as given in 2 Vern. 568, is very meagre. But there are fortunately preserved in Lincoln's Inn Library the cases both of the appellants and the respondents upon the appeal to the H. L. I have referred to those cases because the facts are much more fully stated in them. The report in 2 Vern. states that the Lord Keeper held "that the devise to the testator's wife being in the same clause in which she was named executrix, and not said free and exempt from payment of debts, she must therefore take it as executrix, and the same must be applied to the payment of debts." But the question whether the testator's personal estate was exonerated by virtue of the deed which he had executed conveying real estate to trustees on trust for the payment of his debts, was raised by the cases both of the appellants and of the respondents in the H. L. It is to be observed that not a word is said . . . about the wife taking the personal estate as executrix. The report in 2 Vern. states that which does not appear in the recital of the deed in the decree—that the trust was for the payment of the testator's "debts, legacies, and funerals." Consequently, the deed in that case contained all the words which are contained in the deed in the present case. The nature of the deed appears from the recital of it in the original decree. It appears that by that deed provision was made for the payment of the testator's debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, out of the trust property, and it was only subject to that payment that the surplus was given over to the beneficiaries—just as in the present case the surplus is given over to the testator's two sons. I find it impossible, therefore, so far to discover any distinction between the two cases; and, if I had any doubt about the correctness of the decision, and there was nothing else in the present case, I should feel myself bound by French v. Chichester, which is a decision of the highest tribunal, to hold that the personal estate of the testator in the present case is not exonerated from the payment of his debts—p. 680.

JESSEL, M. R.—I do not intend to go through the cases which have been cited. I have done so to a very considerable extent in . . . Leonino v. Leonino, but I will say this, that they are no further a guide to another tribunal in deciding a case upon this subject than any cases of construction and a guide to a Court of construction on another instrument, that is to say, they help the Court in considering what the true meaning of words and phrases may be, but lay down no absolute rule which prevents the Court of construction arriving at its own conclusion from the words used, irrespective of the actual authority of the decided cases not laying decisions upon the same instrument or on the same words.—p. 223. JAMES, J., concurred.

COTTON, J. J.—Bute (Marquis) v. Cunningham. No doubt the use of the word "collateral" in that case in a series of instruments relating to the property was held by Lord Eldon to mean that the result of the whole transaction was that one property was not to be called upon to provide for payment of part of the debt; but when it was said there in argument that "collateral" did not mean "secondary," so as to make the other the primary security, Lord Eldon did not lay down any rule saying that that was the meaning of the word. He expressly refused to do so, and went upon the whole of the subsequent transactions, as well as the transactions relating to the creation of the particular security, in determining, as he did, that the freehold estate in that case was to bear the whole of the mortgage, and that no part of it was to be thrown upon the collaterals. So that that case, as it seems to me, cannot be referred to as any authority for the purpose of showing that "collateral" security means "secondary" as regards another security for the same debt. Lipcomb v. Lipcomb and De Rochefort v. Daines do not establish the proposition that where there is a further security at a subsequent time, without anything more, it is to be considered as secondary as between the different persons claiming the two properties from the mortgagee. In each of these cases the judges came to the conclusion, as matter of construction, that, as regards the original debt—for there was an additional debt in both cases—the estate originally mortgaged was primarily charged. In neither of the cases was it laid down as a general proposition that, when a security is given and there is at a subsequent period a further security, as between the parties claiming the two estates, one is considered as the primary and the other the secondary security.—p. 225.

JESSEL, M. R.—It has been enacted that a general devise for payment of debts out of personal estate shall not be deemed to exonerate mortgaged properties, and what is there in this case to take it out of the general rule? If I were to decide otherwise, I should have to hold that every devise of a life interest in real estate was an expression of a contrary intention. It does not appear to me that Locke King's Act was intended to apply as between specific and residuary devises in the way it was held to apply in Brownson v. Lawrence—p. 155.

NORTH, J.—Brownson v Lawrence is inconsistent with the decision of Chelmsford, L. C., in Hensman v Fryer (supra, col. 1093), and with that of Mahon, V.-C., in Gibbins v Byden (supra, col. 1095), in which case the V.-C. pointed out that Lord Romilly had, in Brownson v Lawrence, overlooked Hensman v Fryer, which decided that a residuary devise is still specific. I cannot follow Brownson v Lawrence without departing from the decision of Jessel, M. R., in Sackville v Smyth. I am unable to find anything else in the will to take the case out of the general rule except the words "absolutely to do with as she thinks proper." But that is no more than a gift to the widow in fee, it does not say that she is not to take the house subject to its proportion of the mortgage debt. It would come to this that every devise of an absolute interest in real property would be an expression of a "contingent or other intention." I cannot follow Brownson v Lawrence. I prefer to follow the later decisions—p. 111.

That has been the law for a long time, and I have no doubt that it has been acted upon in many cases. Moreover looking at the Act, I must say that I myself should, in the absence of that decision, have taken the same view. I desire, therefore, that it be understood, not only that I follow the decision of the M. R. in Solomon v Solomon, but that I construe the Act in the same manner as he did—p. 666.

HALSBURY, L. C.—There remains another point which has been argued before us with great ingenuity by Mr. Stirling. I must admit in his favour that I do not see how Brown v Groombridge, to which he has referred, could have been decided or argued as it was without the point that he has impressed upon us being before the mind of the Court—but I must say that the decision has not passed at present into such a condition of authority that we cannot venture to differ from it. It is admitted that if the personal estate is directed to be exonerated out of the real estate the exoneration ceases so far as regards any personal estate which becomes undisposed of. Why should not the same rule apply to a direction to exonerate the general personal estate out of a particular fund of personality? I can see no reason for a distinction between the two cases. The text-books are silent upon any such distinction. Brown v Groombridge has not been referred to as supporting it, and so far as I know the distinction between personality and realty in that respect has never since been discussed. I am therefore not disposed to be bound by that case so as to establish what appears to me an arbitrary and unreasonable distinction—p. 63.

LINDLEY, J.—There is another point as regards the leaseholds. Mr. Stirling contends that where a fund of personality is set apart to exonerate the general personal estate it is to be applied in exonerating leased gifts, as well as those which take effect, and he refers to Brown v Groombridge, which he contends has decided that point in his favour. It would seem that the Court must have so decided, but I am very much struck with the fact that it does not seem to have been treated as settling the law on this point. I cannot find any trace of it in any text-book, and I cannot see upon what rational principle such a distinction between personal estate and real estate can be drawn. It seems to me, therefore, that it is open for us to say that even if the Court did in that case decide the point, it never has become part of the law—p. 64.

FRY, J.—Upon the second point I conceive that the general rule of law is that which was laid down by Kindersley, V.-C., in Dacre v Patricson. He says there, "It is a general rule, in the absence of any expression of intention to the contrary, that if a testator charges real estate with payment of debts in exoneration of his personal estate, and bequeaths the personal estate to particular individuals, he is held to have intended to exonerate his personal estate for the benefit only of those legatees, and, therefore, if the bequest of the personal estate fails, whether by the death of the legatee in the lifetime of the testator, or by reason of the Statute of Mortmain, so that the personal estate goes to other persons than those intended by the testator, those persons are not entitled to the benefit of the exoneration." That enunciation of the rule no doubt applies to cases where there is a conflict between real estate and personal estate, but in my view it is only a branch of the more general principle—that where the gift to the person intended to be benefited by the exoneration fails, the exoneration itself fails, the right to the benefit of the exoneration being in fact a part of the legacy which fails. That principle applies in my mind whether the property dealt with be realty or personality, and I think we should be wrong if we drew a distinction between them on the ground of a doubtful case in which the point appears never really to have been insisted upon and was not dealt with in the judgment—p. 66.

constituting the testator a complete shareholder but for requiring the undertaking itself a working concern. Having regard to the cases, I cannot help thinking that if the learned judge who decided Jarques v. Chambers had not thought himself bound by Blount v. Hykiss and Barry v. Harding (supra), he would not have arrived at the conclusion that he did arrive at. I think the M.R. in Armstrong v. Burnet felt some difficulty in reconciling the decision in that case with that which he felt to be the just principle, and upon which he decided Addams v. Perick, namely, that the question depends entirely upon this, whether the call was made before or after the testator's death—p. 265.

COTTON, L.J.—Now if an executor pays the money to the residuary legatee with knowledge of a debt, and he is afterwards obliged to pay that debt, he no doubt, cannot call on the residuary legatee to refund. It is said that here there was notice of a debt. But there was no debt until a call was made. There was only a liability which might become a debt. In Jervis v. Wolferstan it was held by Sir G. Jessel, M.R. that notice of liability when the executor pays over a residue, does not take away his right to make the residuary legatee refund if it afterwards becomes a debt. It is true that the M.R. speaks of the shadowy nature of the liability in that case; but he does not proceed on that, he goes on the principle that notice of a mere liability is not enough, there must be notice of a debt—p. 11.

LORDS MELBORNE, BLACKBURN and WATSON all followed Garland, Ex parte. LORD BLACKBURN further said in Jervis v. Walferton (supra, col. 1103) the M. R. goes so far as to say, "I take it to be a general rule that where persons accept at the request of another, and that other is a cestui que trust, he is personally liable to indemnify the trustees for any loss accruing in the due execution of the trust." Perhaps this rule is too broadly stated, as something must depend on the nature of the trust and of the interest of the cestui que trust, but it is not necessary now to say more than that this rule has no application to a case where the maker of the trust is not a cestui que trust. . . . (p. 872). The extent of the right which trustees have to be indemnified, and the manner in which creditors can by encroachment work it for their own benefit, were discussed by the M. R. in Johnson, In re (supra). The M. R. there says what Garland, Ex parte decides is "that the claim of the creditors is limited to the assets devoted to trade."—p. 875.

MELBORNE, L.C.—On this settlement it is clear that it was intended that the asylum should be carried on by Dr. Sabben and not by the trustees; and that if he did not carry it on it should be sold with the goodwill. It is, therefore, impossible to compare the case with Garland, Ex parte, and Johnson, In re, and the other cases where there has been an express direction by the testator to carry on a business, and where he specially appropriated part of his property for that purpose. Those authorities proceed on this principle, that where a particular part of a trust estate is specifically dedicated to a particular purpose which involves trade debts and liabilities, it is a trust to use it for that particular purpose, and the trustee, though personally liable for the debts which he contracts in the course of the business, has a right to be paid out of the specific assets appropriated for that purpose, and the trade creditors are not to be disappointed of payment so far as the assets so appropriated are concerned. But the authorities tend to limit that doctrine rather than to extend it. Garland, Ex parte, shows that the creditor can only have recourse to the particular part of the property of which there has been such an express dedication; and the right cannot be extended beyond that, either in bankruptcy or in administration. And that applies even to cases in which the trustee has merely done his duty in carrying on the business, and where he may be entitled to an indemnity for the expenses incurred by him.—p. 248. LORD HERSCHELL.—With all deference, I am unable to concur in the distinction drawn [by the C. A.] between the assets which come into the hands of the executors at the time of the death of the testator, and property which, in the capacity of executors, they afterwards acquire. Abbott v. Parfitt seems to be a distinct authority that property so acquired is as much assets of the testator as that which was in his possession at the time of his death. It was there held that the price of goods sold to the defendant by the executors, who had carried on then testator's business, no part of the materials of which had belonged to the testator, would, when recovered, be assets of the testator, and I do not think it possible, on principle, to maintain the suggested distinction.—p. 198.

COTTON, L. J.—In Boyes v. Bedale the question was on the construction of a bequest in the will of a domiciled Englishman to the children of a person named. The V.-C. held that a child exactly in the same position as Hannah Perret was not entitled under the bequest. He said that the will being that of a domiciled Englishman must be construed according to English law, which in my opinion is correct so far as to require that this word "children" shall be construed "legitimate children." But he held that English law recognised as legitimate only those children born in wedlock. This, though correct as regards the children of persons domiciled in England at the time of their birth, is, in my opinion erroneous as to children born of parents who at the time of the birth were domiciled in a country by the law of which the children were legitimate. The V.-C. at the end of his judgment in Boyes v. Bedale, expressed his opinion that any claim under the Statute of Distributions would be dealt with in the same way. There is, therefore, a conflict of decisions and, in my opinion, the decision in Boyes v. Bedale is contrary to principle, and erroneous—pp. 295, 296

COTTON, L.J.—The present case is not at all like *Ridgway v. ROMER, J.—Since Harman v. Harman it has been considered settled law that an executor who pays creditors without notice of the existence of a creditor of higher degree is not liable to account for the sums so paid at the instance of that creditor. . . . The plaintiffs referred to Blake v. Gale, where executors who were also some of the residuary legatees and had retained their own share of the residue were at the instance of creditors made liable to account for the shares of residue retained by them as being still in their hands. But that case is quite distinguishable. A legatee is a volunteer, and assets paid to him may be followed by a creditor. A creditor is not a volunteer, and a creditor of higher degree has no right because of that position only to follow assets in the hand of an executor paid to or retained by him in the discharge of his own debt.—p. 621.

10. PROCEEDINGS.

At Common Law.

Wate v. Briggs (1694) 1 Ld. Raym. 35, 2 Saik. 565; 6 Mod. 8, overruled.
Bonafoos v. Walker (1787) 2 Term Rep. 126.

Hosier v. Arundell (Lord) (1802) 3 Bos. & P. 7, questioned.

Betts v. Mitchell (1714) 10 Mod. 318, overruled.

Partridge v. Court (1818) 5 Price 412.

GRAHAM, B.—On consideration I cannot but think that Chambre, J., in Hosier v. Arundell (Lord), carried his opinion too far in putting a promissory note on the same footing, in a question of this nature, as a bond. In that case where a bond was given to the executor in his own name, I think the judgment right, because such a speciality would have the effect of annihilating the previous debt, creating a new and personal obligation of a higher nature, and, therefore, I am obliged to say with deference that I cannot hold the opinion of Chambre, J. to be right, in putting a promissory note on the same footing as a bond.—p. 419.

WOOD, B.—But I consider that case [Betts v. Mitchell] to have been since properly overruled by subsequent decisions, and on very good grounds.—p. 421.

Henshall v. Roberts (1804) 5 East 150; 1 Smith 375.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J.—If it had been alleged that they sued as executors, &c., that would have been enough to have raised the other question, whether a count, upon promises on an account stated with one as executor, can be joined with other counts on promises with the testator; upon which there are authorities both ways. The cases in favour of the proposition are Bull v. Palmer and Mason v. Jackson, together with the opinion of Buller, J. in the cases cited (King v. Thom and Cockerill v. Kynaston), that wherever the sum recovered by the executor on promises to himself would be assets in his hands, there the count may be joined with counts on promises made to the testator. But there are many authorities the other way; and I think you will hardly find the point tenable.—p. 154.

BLACKBURN, J.—The later cases have—as Parke, B. says in the passage cited from Heath v Chilton—conclusively settled that an executor has the option to sue in his representative character on contracts made with himself, where the money, when recovered, would be assets (though in a great many such cases he might sue in his personal capacity), and he adds that that rule ought not to be disturbed, in this I fully agree. When the executor, not acting in conformity with the directions of the will, there can be no doubt in what character they are acting. But it sometimes happens—and that is what often raises a difficulty—that the executor or administrator is also beneficially interested as legatee or next of kin, and as soon as he has assented to take, then the benefit would be no longer assets, and, on the other hand—as, for instance, in the case of a lease—he becomes personally responsible for any burthens attached to the subject-matter. And the question therefore sometimes might be, in what character was the business being carried on by the executor or administrator? By losing sight of this distinction, Bolingbroke v Kerr may very probably have been misunderstood. There the intestate died leaving a daughter, a minor, who, however, afterwards took out administration, probably, therefore, she was an only child and sole next of kin; she married, and she and her husband carried on the business for more than two years; the business was carried on with money which the wife had received from the intestate's estate—probably therefore with the wife's fortune, but it is hardly likely that they were carrying it on for such a length of time for the benefit of the estate. It is much more likely that it was carried on, though, in point of fact, by the administratrix, yet by the administratrix after having assented to take it as next of kin and so as belonging to her, in which case the husband ought clearly to have sued alone. So understood, the case would be in perfect conformity with the decided cases. In the Law Journal, it is true, it is said that the administratrix and her husband carried on the business for the benefit of the deceased's estate, but in the Law Reports there is no such statement, and I cannot but think that there must be a mistake in the Law Journal. For if that really had been found as a fact, the decision must have overruled very numerous cases on the subject, or the Court must have distinguished them in some way which I cannot understand; and it is incredible that the Court should have done this sub silentio. The facts in the Law Reports leave the case consistent with previous cases, and the report is probably right. And the Law Journal must have misapprehended what was the evidence upon which the point was reserved.—p. 349.

MELLOR, J. to the same effect.

HANNEN, J., who also concurred, said. In Moseley v Rendell I rested my judgment on the fact that the materials employed belonged to the intestate; that was sufficient for the decision of that case, and it was unnecessary to consider Bolingbroke v Kerr—p. 351.

DENMAN, J.—In Williams on Executors (7th ed. vol. i. p. 798), a work in itself of great authority, all the cases on the subject are commented upon, and the law is stated entirely in accordance with the dictum of Richardson, J. in Knights v Quarles. It is distinctly laid down that an executor may recover damages to the personal estate arising out of a contract, though an action of tort might have been brought for the personal injury, resulting from the same act of the defendant, before the death of the testator. Alton v. Midland Ry. [(1864) 34 L J C P 292; 19 C. B. (N S) 213. See "CARPENTERS," col. 285] is also referred to in a note, and it is clear that the learned author, who was a judge of this Court when that case was decided, looked upon the dictum of Willes, J. in that case as a confirmation of the opinion of Richardson, J. in Knights v Quarles. He proceeds, however, to say that the rule there laid down must be taken to be limited by a qualification introduced by the modern decision of Chamberlain v. Williamson, viz., that an action by the executor for breach of contract will not lie where the damage is purely personal, and there is no damage to the estate. In that case the action was for breach of promise of marriage, and the decision turns distinctly on the ground that there was no special damage stated on the record, and so the executor could not have an action because the only damages recoverable were purely personal. Here, the damages are not personal in their nature, but are damages to the estate, the case fails, therefore, within the rule as laid down by Sir E. V. Williams, and not the exception. Again, Potter v. Metropolitan Ry., though not exactly in point, is to some extent an authority in favour of the view we take. In one respect it was a stronger case, for it was doubtful there whether the declaration was in contract, whereas it clearly is so here. There the wife was the person to whom the injury was done, and she sued as executrix to her husband, who had died, in respect of the damage to the personal estate. The case was not, therefore, one of personal injury ultimately causing death, and consequently is not on all fours with the present. The principle, however, of the decision is quite consistent with our judgment in this case.—p 194.

MELLOR, J.—With the single exception, so far as I am aware, of . . . Bradshaw v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry., there appears to be no authority that an action will be by the executor in respect of what is claimed in this action. But as that case has been decided on the very point, I entirely yield to the authority of the decision, so far as to say that in this Court it cannot be questioned, and we must therefore abide by it. I must say, however, that we yield to it for the purposes of this case, and that, at all events, if it is to be questioned, it must be questioned in a C. A.—p 603

LINDLEY, L.J.—The decision . . . appears to me to be substantially correct, subject to one qualification. Care must be taken not to give countenance to the notion that by seeking out an infant plaintiff who may be a residuary legatee, or interested, perhaps, in a very small portion of the estate, an administration judgment may be obtained at the expense of the estate as a matter of course as it used to be obtained. I hope that state of things is gone, and gone for ever. It was one of the greatest scandals of the profession. It is stuck at, and I hope most effectively, by means of Ord. LV. and especially by Ord. LXV. as to costs, since, subject to a reservation made by the latter rule with regard to the right of executors and trustees and mortgages as to costs, the costs of administration actions, whether instituted by next friends of infants or by any one else, are in the discretion of the Court, and, being in the discretion of the Court, the Court will deal with them in a proper manner. Thus, if it finds (as for anything I know, it may be found here) that these modified inquiries which we think ought to be made are really unnecessary. Ray, J. can make the next friend of the infant and the other plaintiff pay all the costs, including the costs of the appeal.—p. 918.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is said that it was decided . . . in Woodridge v. Norris that it was unnecessary to file a bill on behalf of all the creditors in order to obtain administration of the real estate; but it does not appear to me that he [the V.-C.] did so decide. In the first place, there was in that case (as the V.-C. observed in his judgment) an express trust in the testator's will to pay the debt, and in the next place it was a decision on a demurrer, and all that the V.-C. said was that he would not, in any case have allowed the objection to prevail, which may have meant that he would have given liberty to amend. On the other hand, in Ponsford v. Hartley, Lord Hatherley, when V.-C., allowed a demurrer to a bill by a creditor for administration of real estate, on the ground that the suit was not on behalf of all creditors. It seems to me, therefore, that the old practice was clearly established; and, to my regret, I find nothing in the new rules to alter it. The good sense of the matter is entirely in accordance with the view of Hall, V.-C. in Cooper v. Blissett, but the rule is express, that, while no other provision is made by the orders, the old procedure and practice remain. The writ had better be amended by making the plaintiff sue on behalf of himself and all other creditors.—p. 110.

WORTH, J.—I think it must have been stated in the title of the statement of claim in that case that the plaintiff was suing on behalf of all the other creditors. I think that the reference there to the action being entitled "In the matter of the estate" shows that the matter with which the M.R. was dealing was the title of the action. The whole judgment deals only, I think, with the title of the action, and the reason why he considered it unnecessary that the writ should be amended was because the title of the statement of claim showed that the plaintiff was suing in a representative capacity.—p. 550.

ROMER, L.J.—That case [Hopkins, in re] to my mind is clearly distinguishable and does not apply to the present case. Under the Bankruptcy Act and Rules applying at that time, the creditor who in that case wished to come in and change his proof could not have amended his proof in bankruptcy, and would not have been allowed to do so; and when he came in and was obliged to confess that, in bankruptcy, he would not have been allowed to change his proof, he was met by the unanswerable objection in Chancery, "Who is your special circumstance? There is no special circumstance, and the Bankruptcy Rules are against you"; and accordingly it was held that, not being allowed to change his proof in bankruptcy, there were no special circumstances entitling the Court to allow him to vary the certificate or alter his proof in Chancery. That is the whole case.—p. 699

Ashley v. Ashley (1877) 46 L. J. Ch. 322; 4 Ch. D. 757, 36 L. T. 200, 25 W. R. 356—C.A. BAGGALLAY, J.A. (for self and JAMES, J.)—In some of the cases cited, and which have been much relied upon, as for instance, in Williamson v. Naylor, it will be found that the Court simply made a decree or order for carrying into execution certain trusts for the benefit of creditors, and, having directed an inquiry as to who were entitled to the trust funds, eventually made an order for payment to the persons whose titles were certified. There was not in any of these cases any general administration decree operating as a judgment in favour of the creditors. Again, the facts of Wild v. Banning hardly support the marginal note, for though the M.R. intimated an opinion that the creditors who ultimately established their claims would be entitled to divide the funds, he only decided that the trustee was not entitled to the unrecieved funds, and he directed an inquiry as to who were entitled to them. But, whilst the orders relied upon by the appellants fail to show any lengthened uniform practice as the direction contended for by them, Alderson v. Petrie singularly illustrates the course, which, in our opinion, ought to be adopted in like cases. The principle upon which that decision was based is, in our judgment, unimpeachably sound, and we must act on the same principle in the case before us—pp. 328–330.

In this conflict of authority, it is not easy to say whether I am following or differing from the prior authorities, but I think the weight of authority is in favour of my conclusion, that sect. 32 is not introduced into the administration of the estates of deceased persons—p. 550. STIRLING, J.—It was there held that, in the administration by the Court of the assets of a deceased person the claim of a woman for money lent to her husband for the purposes of his trade or business was, by the combined effect of sect. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1876, postponed to the claims of his other creditors. This case seems to me to be decided on the principle (expressly stated by the present M.R. in his judgment) that "the rules in bankruptcy as to debts and liabilities provable must now, I think, include all rules as to priorities expressly enacted by any statute and made applicable in the event of bankruptcy." It is contended on behalf of the creditors for rates that this principle ought to be applied in the present case. It is said that sect. 3 [of the Preferential Payments Act, 1886] expressly limits the operation of the Act to receiving orders, orders made under sect. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act and the winding-up of companies. Sect. 3 appears to me to provide that not every administration in bankruptcy or winding-up is to be affected by the Act, but only those where an order has been made after the period fixed for the commencement of the Act. I do not think it was meant to exclude the application of sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875. . . I have the least difficulty in arriving at this conclusion that it agrees with the opinion expressed by the present M.R. in Leng, In re. . . It is true that his lordship does not make any reference to sect. 3, but it seems most improbable that this section should have been overlooked. —p. 27.

ROMER, J.—Maggs, In re, can, I think, no longer be regarded as an authority. The attention of Fry, J., when he decided that case, was not directed to, and he did not in his judgment deal with, those words of sect. 10 which formed the basis of the decision in Leng, In re, and which form the basis of our present decision.—p. 8.

 JESSEL, M.R.—But for two recent decisions of Malins, V.-C., I should have thought that that question [whether a Court can administer an estate without having before it the legal personal representative of the testator or intestate, where an executor de son tort or the legal personal representative of such an executor is before the Court] was unarguable. I have always supposed that this Court could not make a decree for general administration in the absence of the legal personal representative. In Rayner v. Koehler, the first of his two decisions, Malins, V.-C. decided the contrary, but he did not go into the subject very fully, nor perhaps very carefully. Then followed Cary v. Hills, in which my predecessor, Lord Romilly, declined to follow Rayner v. Koehler. Then came Coote v. Whittington, the second of the two cases, and in it unquestionably the V.-C. did examine the subject with the greatest minuteness and care. I have read his judgment most carefully, but am unable to follow his reasoning, or to agree with his conclusion. I should not, however, have ventured to express so strongly my dissent from the V.-C., had not my attention been called to two decisions which are in opposition to his, one by Lord Cottenham, Penny v. Watts, which is binding upon me, and the other by Lord Hanbury, Beadmore v. Gregory, which is not absolutely binding, but is of equal authority with the decisions of Malins, V.-C., and I should prefer to follow it in a case where difference of opinion exists. Such being the state of the authorities, I must hold the law of the Court to be, that a suit for administration is defective when the legal personal representative is not before the Court.—p. 22.

MALINS, V.-C.—I am aware that Coote v. Whittington was subjected to criticism by Sir G. Jessel in Rowseell v. Morris, and I think, in answer to the observations made by him, I may say that he expressed himself somewhat incoherently, for he decides that you cannot administer an estate in this Court without having before it the legal personal representative of the testator or intestate, although an executor de son tort or the legal personal representative of such an executor is before the Court. If, as he says, you cannot sue a person as executor de son tort, then any person may enter upon and take possession of the property of a deceased, and he cannot be sued for doing so. I know of no character in which such a man can be sued, except it is that of an executor de son tort, as I pointed out in Coote v. Whittington. It would be the height of injustice if a man could possess himself of the assets of a testator, and because he did not choose to clothe himself with the character of administrator, could not therefore be sued in respect of such assets. I have already decided the contrary, first in Rayner v. Koehler (supra), and then in Coote v. Whittington, and I believe that what I decided in those cases has been the rule ever since the statute of Elizabeth.—p. 305.

HALL, V.-C.—Bowsher v Watkins has been frequently cited, and there is apparently in the report of the judgment, which is very short, some ground for saying that an opinion was there expressed by the M. R. which might warrant the general proposition that in every case where there is a refusal to sue, a residuary legatee might himself sue the alleged debtor—the alleged debtor in that case, as in many others, being a surviving partner. But that case has, as was stated during the argument, been commented upon on several occasions, and suffice it to say, in Darcey v. Davies (supra) and in Wright v. Hamilton (supra), it is stated by the judges who decided those cases that there were special circumstances in Bowsher v. Watkins which accounted for the view that was taken by the Court; therefore it is not to be considered an authority establishing that a mere refusal to sue is sufficient to entitle a residuary legatee to institute an action against the debtor to the estate. I agree therefore, with what was said by the defendant's counsel here, that that case had better never be referred to again as supporting any such general proposition. [His lordship then discussed Laundrie v. Elors, Tavis v. Midor and Stratton v. Crenshaw, and continued.] In Hilliard v. Biffe there is a judgment given of the V.-C. of Ireland, in which he says (L. R. 7 H. L. 44, n.). "The rule now appears to be subject to the exceptions of cases of collusion, of insolvency of the personal representatives, of refusal by them to sue, whether collusively or bona fide, on the existence of what has been rather vaguely termed 'special circumstances.'" I do not, however, consider that the V.-C. in that case had down, or meant to lay down, any such rule as that mere refusal to sue would in any case be sufficient without the Court taking into consideration the circumstances of the particular case, and I cannot treat it as an authority of the V.-C. for such a proposition. But if his statement of the rule is to be construed and read otherwise, I must say I respectfully dissent from it, and I think that it is at variance with the other authorities to which I have been referred.—pp. 214, 215.

JESSUP, M. R.—Roberts v. Roberts was a case of great singularity. Now, speaking with all deference to Lord Cottenham, who decided that case, there are portions of his judgment I am unable to follow. The testator gave his residuary personal estate to his three daughters, who were his only children, with an ultimate trust, in the event of their all dying under twenty-one, and without having been married, for those who would then be entitled under the Statutes of Distribution. The testator's widow was joined as co-plaintiff in a suit for the administration of the estate, and a general demurrer was put in on the ground of misjoinder, if being contended that the widow has not such an interest as entitles her to be a party. It was held that she was a proper party, but for a reason I cannot understand. If it had been said that she was at present actually entitled to a portion of the testator's personal estate I could have understood the decision. She had no doubt an interest as well as the next-of-kin at the testator's death, but subject to its being defeated. But that was not the ground of the decision. The ground upon which I feel a difficulty is this, that Lord Cottenham makes a distinction between the widow and the next-of-kin. He says, "There is a great difference between the widow and the next-of-kin. The next-of-kin are unascertained. The widow is no part of a class, but entitled in her own individual right, to a share of her husband's estate." Now, the gift was to a class to be ascertained at a future time, and the widow was not at present a member of that class. She might have been if she had lived so long, so might the testator's present next-of-kin if they had lived so long. It seems to me therefore, that the distinction which Lord Cottenham makes was not a sufficient answer to the question. He says in his judgment, "Now, even assuming the appellant's construction of the will to be correct, the widow is already contingently entitled to a share of the testator's estate in the event of her surviving her children, and their all dying under twenty-one and unmarried. Nothing can prevent her taking a share, but her dying before the period arrives at which the interest of the daughters ceases. She is no part of a class, but has a separate and individual right to a portion of her husband's property not disposed of." Now, if Lord Cottenham means that as the widow takes a share now, and therefore will be entitled even if the contingent class fails, I can understand his decision. It is clear that he makes a distinction between the members of the class and the widow, but, with great deference, I see no such distinction. The gift is to a class of persons of whom the widow may or may not be one. How can that be such an interest as to enable her to maintain a suit?—p. 416.

COTTON, L.J.—In Cloves v Hilliard the persons claiming to have an interest were persons who claimed to be next-of-kin under a gift to the testator's next-of-kin, to be ascertained at a period which had not then arrived. Had the time arrived they would have had an interest as members of the class designated, but they had not then. A person who if he lives to a certain time, and no one else comes in to cut off his claim, will become entitled, has only a possibility, and not such an interest as will entitle him to maintain an action. I think that Clowes v. Hilliard is no authority for the proposition for which it was cited. Nor was Davis v. Angel, because there, there was a gift of a share of residue to the testator's nephew for his life, conditional on his marrying a certain lady, with remainder for his eldest or any child which should attain twenty-one years. During the life of the testator, and apparently with his consent, the nephew married another lady. The testator never altered his will, but the nephew's son, in spite of his father's having made this marriage, brought an action, contending that as it was possible that his father might, after the death of his mother marry the lady named by the testator, he, the son, had still an interest in the fund. Neither of these cases applies here, the plaintiff has an actual interest, and one which may very possibly arise.—p 745. BOWMAN and PRY, L.J. concurred.

LITTLEDALE, J.—I was not present at the decision of Foster v. Blakelock; the point, in that case, regarding the effect of a prolate stamp, as prima facie evidence of assets, does not seem to have been much considered, and the stamp in such a case is less conclusive, as the Stamp Act [56 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 38] requires the whole value of the estate and effects to be sworn to, without deducting anything on account of debts due from the deceased.—p 663.

PARKER, J.—No doubt it was rightly held, in Crosse v. Smith, that an executor, having received assets, cannot discharge himself by paying the money over to his co-executor. Here, however, the presumption of such receipt is not raised, but, on the contrary, rebutted by the evidence. The point referred to as decided in Foster v. Blakelock does not appear to have undergone much discussion there, and I cannot concur in that decision.—p 663.

JESSE, J., M. R.—I will here say a word upon Job v. Job, which was recently before me, and which I understand has led to some misapprehension. I there said that in administration actions an order charging an executor with wilful default may be made at any time during the progress of the action. Now an order charging an executor with wilful default could not be made unless he was so charged in the pleadings; therefore the charge, unless originally pleaded, must be introduced by amendment—that is, of course, by amendment at any stage of the action at which amendments may be made, that is, before judgment. The general rule is that, in every case an order charging wilful default must be based upon a charge of wilful default in the pleadings. There has, however, been always an exception to that rule, namely, in the case of a mortgage in possession. You always make a decree against him of wilful default in respect of rents and profits, though no charge of wilful default has been made in the pleadings, and there has been no proof of it at the trial. That is the exception to the general rule. On what principle does that exception depend? Now, upon that one may refer to the books to see what is the extent of the exception to the general rule, and, secondly, what is the supposed reason on which the exception is founded. One reason, perhaps, formerly was that the Court looked with less favour on a mortgagee, who, though a trustee, derives a benefit from his trust, than on ordinary or gratuitous trustees, who receive no remuneration for their duties. I will first of all refer to the text books. On referring to Mr Fisher's very learned book on mortgages, I find he says this (8th ed. vol. ii. p. 943): "The account usually directed against the mortgagee in possession, either of tangible property or of a business, is of what he has, or without wilful default might have received from the time of his taking possession." . . . Mr. Fisher's statement of the rule is quite general, and would, in my opinion, be sufficient to decide the case, even if it stood alone, but there are two authorities which seem to me to be conclusive on the point.—p. 426.

HALL, V.-C. said he could not regard Miles v. Harrison (supra) otherwise than as an authority that the costs of an administration suit were included in the words "testamentary expenses." The headnote to the report of that case in the Law Reports was imperfect, and, looking at the note only, one wondered how the argument arose. The main question was as to the marshalling of assets in favour of charities, but still other questions arose, including that of costs. As to the other authorities, the late M.R. in Gilbertson v. Gilbertson, and Stringer v. Harper, considered that "testamentary expenses" did not include the costs of a suit. In Webb v. Beauvoisin, on the other hand, he thought that "testamentary and other expenses" did include costs of suit, though it was not very apparent why the words "and other expenses" should be considered as making a distinction. As to Morrell v. Fisher, he did not think there was a sufficiently substantial distinction between that case and the present. The decision in Brief's Estate, In re, depended on particular circumstances and on the form of a codicil, and did not affect the general question.—p. 518.

MALINS, V.-C., after considering Eyre v. Marsden, said—"This decision evidently proceeded on the grounds of the charge of debts and costs contained in the will . . . Now, with regard to that case [Maddison v. Fye], I must say that I think it is a pity that cases which are to be reported at all should be reported as that was. The particular form of the will is not given, and there are no arguments, or even the name of the counsel engaged, and not a single authority is stated to have been cited. There is nothing to show whether the estate was charged with debts or legacies. Somebody must have told Mr. Beavan that such a case had occurred when he himself was not in Court. The rule is thus laid down, and evidently incorrectly—"Eyre v. Marsden (4 Myl. & Cr. 281) settles this. Where a real estate is disposed of in favour of several persons, and the suit is solely for the administration of the real estate, and some of the shares lapse, these shares are not to be made to bear the costs of the suit, but the costs are to be borne by the real estate"—which was not done in Eyre v. Marsden—"generally, and the heir-at-law's estate is not to bear all the costs." Further on, the M.R. says, "I have always understood the rule to be this: in suits for the administration of the personal estate the part of it undisposed of is first applicable to the payment of the costs, but the rule is different as to real estate. There the heir-at-law is only charged with his proportion of the costs of the suit." The rule as thus laid down is entirely erroneous, and I cannot believe that the M.R. ever stated it in those broad terms; and if he did, I can only say it is impossible that I can follow it.—p. 584.

JESSEL, M.R.—I am sorry that I must entirely differ from the learned V.-C. Malins in the conclusion he has come to as to the state of the law respecting the incidence of costs of administration suits as between a share of residue well bequeathed and another share of residue which has lapsed and therefore devolved upon the next of kin. It appears to have been long settled law that there is no residue of personal estate until after payment of the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and all costs of the administration of the estate of the testator. Therefore, until you have paid the costs, you do not arrive at the net residue at all, and when you do arrive at it, it is distributed according to law. That is the principle.—p. 56

MALINS, V.-C.—No one can doubt that the residuary personal estate is primarily the fund for payment of the costs of administration, and all that I intended to decide in Gowan v. Broughton [in which his lordship had applied the rule in Scott v. Cumberland to a lapsed share of residuary estate] was, that where the residuary personality is given to a person who dies in the lifetime of the testator, such personality is no less the primary fund for payment of the costs than it would have been if the legatee had survived. PEARSON, J.—A great number of cases have been cited, amongst others, Scott v. Cumberland and Gowan v. Broughton. I should very much regret if I were compelled to sit in judgment upon those two cases. I say this from personal motives, because I happened to be counsel in both of them, and I know that I was very much dissatisfied with the decisions in both those cases, and I should, therefore, distrust myself exceedingly in expressing an opinion upon those cases, either for them or against them, unless I had so long a period of tranquillity in which to consider them that I could be perfectly satisfied I had come to a conclusion without being influenced by that which I know was weighing upon me at the time when they were decided. But I am not going to express any opinion on either of those cases, or any other cases. To my mind, the present case is not like either Scott v. Cumberland or Gowan v. Broughton. It is, no doubt, far more like Row v. Row but I do not think it is even quite analogous to Row v. Row. In

Row v. Row there was a devise in the will which was so obscure and so uncertain that it was impossible to affix any meaning to it, and the Court determined that the will must be read as if that devise had not been contained in it. The result was, that, so reading the will and striking the devise out of it, there was no devise whatever of the property, which the V.-C. held to be applicable to the payment of the costs.—p. 160.

Reece's Estate, In re, Gould v. Gould (1866) 35 L. J. Ch. 794, L. R. 2 Eq. 609; 12 Jur. (N.S.) 611. 14 L. T. 881. 14 W. R. 1038.—ROMILLY, M.R., explained.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now I should have felt no doubt at all upon the point had it not been for Reece's Estate, In re. Looking at that case, I may observe, in the first place, that the headnote itself is right. The note is thus:—"In administration suits, where the gross value of the estate to be administered amounts to £1,000 at the time of the institution of the suit, the higher scale of costs applies." There the suit was a creditor's suit for the administration of a testator's estate subject to a mortgage; therefore what was sought to be administered was what he had, namely, his equity of redemption. In taxing the costs the taxing master had taxed according to the lower scale, and a summons was taken out by both plaintiff and defendant for the purpose of having the costs allowed on the higher scale. Now comes the remarkable part of the case. The same firm of solicitors appeared for both the plaintiff and defendant; both counsel argued the same way, and the only point submitted to Lord Romilly was that the lower scale referred to the gross value at the time of the institution of the suit, and not to the ultimate net value after deducting payments made after the suit had been instituted. But the real difficulty in the case was not brought to Lord Romilly's attention at all, and accordingly he passes it over in his judgment. He says: "I am of opinion that the lower scale applies where the gross value of the estate to be administered is below £1,000 at the time when the suit is instituted and not where the net value is below that amount." Now I entirely agree that you are to have regard to the gross value of the estate which is to be administered, but Lord Romilly does not say how you are to apply the scale when the estate to be administered is an equity of redemption only. A man may have property worth £100,000, but if it is in mortgage, all he has actually belonging to him, that is, all that can be administered as his estate, is the equity of redemption, which may be almost valueless. How, then, could you say his estate was worth £100,000? Lord Romilly never did decide this point, and his attention was not called to it. That case therefore cannot be considered an authority, and I shall not follow it. The rule is rightly laid down in the judgment, though it is wrongly applied to the facts.—p. 179.

Miller* is contrary to the current of authority. In Sanders v. Miller the M.R. apportioned the costs, but I cannot help thinking that, in that case, his honour proceeded upon the mistaken impression that there was a trust for conversion. Whether that be so or not, that case is contrary to the current of authority—p. 526. [Varied, post]

JESSEL, M.R.—I think that this case is covered by Patching v. Barnett, but even if it is not, there is no practice established binding on the Court, such as Fry, J. has considered to exist—p. 274.

BRETT, L.J.—I think that, even if Patching v. Barnett were not binding on us, the rule laid down by it is one which we ought to follow. The rule is a just and a fair one, while the contrary rule would be unjust and oppressive.—p. 275. HOLKER, L.J. concurred.

CHITTY, J., after discussing Samuel v. Jones, Gibbons v. Hawley, Bourger v. Griffiths and Smith v. Dale, said—"I now come to the two last decisions on the point. The first is that of North, J., in Lewis v. Trask, in which he declined to order payment to a defaulting executor of any costs out of the estate until he had made good his default. This is what he says. "With regard to Bourger v. Griffiths, I shall only follow it to this extent, that the trustee may have his costs after he has paid into Court the sum in which he is in default. Otherwise I do not think that case applies to the present, because there was no money due from the trustee to be paid into Court, whereas in the present case there is a sum due and an order for its payment into Court." He takes the same ground as that on which I have proceeded. Then Hall, V.-C., in Clare v. Clare, decided a few days afterwards, appears to have made inquiries as to Lewis v. Trask, which had not then been reported, and he makes the following statement, which is worthy of observation, because it has been said that the practice was settled. The V.-C. said that the practice did not appear to him to be settled, and then he went on to say that he preferred to follow the decision in Bourger v. Griffiths, "as it seemed to him to be consistent with good sense to hold that any person who, though adjudicated bankrupt, was retained as a party to an action, as executor or trustee, should be paid his costs." I therefore make an order similar to that in Lewis v. Trask.—pp. 208, 204.

JESSEL, M.R.—It seems to me that the principle has been correctly laid down by Kindersley, V.-C. in Thomas v. Jones. Then the point came before James, V.-C. in Burrell, In re, where the costs of the plaintiff, a residuary legatee in a suit for administering an insufficient estate, were allowed as between solicitor and client. Now I am satisfied that the V.-C. did not intend to lay down any general rule. The only authorities that were cited to him were Burkitt v. Ransom (supra) and Weston v. Clowes (supra), and the V.-C. seems to have been unaware that there were any other authorities on the subject, or, at all events, they were not called to his attention. The V.-C. was evidently dealing only with the particular case before him, and I feel satisfied that he did not intend to interfere with the general rule.—p. 613.

CHITTY, J. — The decision in Williams v. Cooke established that a married woman who, with her husband, is entitled to a mortgage debt, has a charge or incumbrance within the meaning of the 77th section (3 & 4 Will. 1, c. 74) taken in connection with the interpretation clause, but in the present case the point is different. Here, the married woman, together with other beneficiaries, had an interest in the mortgage debt, so that she and her husband together could not have disposed of it, and, moreover, there was another party interested, who was not a party to the deed. — p. 187

dissenting, reversing STIRLING, J.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self and SMITH, L.J.) — In Newton's Trusts, In re, CHITTY, J. appears to have decided the exact point which arises in the present case, and to have decided that the reversionary interest of a married woman in money invested by her husband on mortgage was not within the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act. I confess I have great difficulty in understanding that case. It seems to have turned on the fact that the married woman had a rever-sionary interest in only two-thirds of the mortgage debt, and that the owner of the other third did not join in the assignment. The decision appears to me to be opposed to those which I have mentioned, although, no doubt, it is consistent with Hobby v. Collins (20 L. J. Ch. 199, 4 De Gex & S. 289). I feel compelled to say that I think Newton's Trusts, In re, was decided on too narrow a view of the Act. — p. 360

KAY, L.J. — In Newton's Trusts, In re, trustees of personal estate invested part of it on mortgage. A married woman was entitled to one-third of the personal estate in reversion after a life estate. She and her husband by a deed in 1854, before Malins's Act, purported to convey the tenant for life and the other cestui que trust in reversion in assigning the mortgage debts, and all other the personal property, by way of mortgage, and the married woman ac-knowledgeed this deed under the Fines and Recoveries Act, and that the deed was not sufficient to pass the interest of the married woman in the mortgage debts. The learned judge afterwards referred to the non-concurrence

of one of the cestui que trust in remainder. I suppose because the other cestui que trust could not alone require a transfer to themselves of the mortgage. But I understand the main reason of the decision to be that what the married woman purposed to assign was an equitable interest in a debt secured by mortgage, and not merely an "interest in land," within the meaning of those words in the Fines and Recoveries Act.—p. 362, 363.

ROMILLY, M.R.—In this case, it was held that a married woman could dispose of freeholds settled to her separate use as if she were a feme sole, without an acknowledgment under the statute . . . I have carefully read and considered that case, but am unable to concur with the two learned judges who dissented from and overruled the decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. If the decision had been unanimous, I should not have ventured to differ from it, but as the Lord Chancellor, on reflection, adhered to his previous opinion, the case has not that weight which it would otherwise have possessed. The distinction that the words "separate use," applied only to what the husband would have taken if those words had not been used, does not appear to have been sufficiently presented to the minds of the learned judges who dissented from the Lord Chancellor. I must choose between conflicting decisions, and I am of opinion that on principle, and by the preponderance of authority, it is established, that before the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, a fine was necessary to pass the interest of a married woman in that part of her fee-simple estate which did not belong to her husband, and that since that statute an acknowledgment, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, s. 77, is necessary for that purpose, notwithstanding that the estate of the wife is given for her separate use.—p. 589 [Overruled. See "HUSBAND AND WIFE," post, col. 1253.]

HATHERLEY, L.C.—I am quite satisfied, with reference to the Fines and Recoveries Act, that the course of the observations in Crofts v Middleton was intended to displace the error that I fell into, of saying the statute was not intended to give effect to that which could only be operated upon de facto if the deed were executed, and not as to matters settled by contract.—p. 110.

[Counsel cited Kipdusley, V.-C. in In re Hayes.—"He would make the order for payment out on her examination only." This was in fact substituting examination for an acknowledgment by deed.]

JESSEL, M.R.—That cannot possibly be the principle. There must have been some mode before the Fines and Recoveries Act of enabling married women to make their election in such cases (p. 654). The object, therefore, of requiring the married woman to be examined was to enable her to elect whether she would take the money as land or as money. In the case before Kindersley, V.-C., the true reason for examining the wife had evidently been overlooked.—p. 655

JESSEL, M.R.—The difficulty arises from a decision of Chief Justice Tindal in Webster v. Carline. But for that decision I should have thought it too clear for argument that the commissioners for taking acknowledgments appointed under sect. 81 were able, when appointed, to act for any county. The Act does not say they are to be appointed for taking acknowledgments for such county, but they are to be appointed "for every county" to be perpetual commissioners for taking such acknowledgments. I am of opinion that this acknowledgment is valid. With the greatest deference to the Court of Common Pleas, I am unable to find any such restriction as they found in the Act, and I must further suppose that if Chief Justice Bovill had not taken the same view as I do he would not have allowed the certificate to be filed.—p. 901.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—In the case of Re Eady, the affidavit was signed by the judge and not by the deponent, it being contrary to the practice of the Courts in Hamburg that any signature should be attached to an affidavit except that of the judge before whom the oath is administered. The Court however, required that fact to be verified by affidavit. Tindal, C.J. observing that, "to the eye of a person merely looking at the affidavit, the evidence would otherwise appear incomplete." Here we are asked to go a step farther, but it is to be observed that that case occurred before the Rule of Court of Hilary Term, 1863. I am of opinion that, having regard to that case and to the rule, there is enough here to cure the defect —1, 352

That case must have been decided under a misapprehension, for in the Law Journal Reports it is stated that the Court were, I do not say intentionally, but plainly, informed that no parliamentary definition had been given in the statute itself, which was correct as regards the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, but they were not told, through some oversight, that in the Public Health Act, 1848, which was in existence at the time this decision was given, there was such a definition. That definition enacts that "owner" is to be interpreted as "the person for the time being in receipt of the rack rent"—p 80.

RUSSELL, C.J.—Then comes this provision [in the order of the Board of Trade of July 9th, 1890, constituting the North Eastern Sea Fisheries Committee], which is also important "All the members shall retire, and the new members shall come into office in each year on the 9th day of November." I refer to that because it makes intelligible what at first sight did not seem to me so in some of the observations of the then V. Williams, J. (quod V. Williams, L.J.) in the Plymouth Case, where he spoke of the appointment each year of the fishery inspector. It would appear from the constitution of this body that, unlike most similar bodies, as to which the usual provision is that a certain proportion of them retire annually—it seems to be the scheme of the constitution of this body that they shall all retire, being capable of re-election, but that they shall all retire at the end of each year. So that there would seem to be, therefore, a moment of time when the Fisheries Committee did not exist, although its members were capable of being re-elected, or fresh persons might be elected in their place. Therefore, there does seem to have been ground for the language used by V. Williams, J. in the Plymouth Case, in which he spoke of the reappointment annually of the fishery inspector. . . . Perhaps I ought explicitly to add that if the semble to the headline in the report of the Plymouth Case is rightly attributed to V. Williams, J., I do not agree with it.

WILKS, J.—A tributary is that which contributes, and I cannot understand why a stream of water should be any less a tributary because before it reaches the Severn it falls into another stream which has another name. That this stream is a "tributary" seems to me to be absolutely free from doubt. I can understand the views taken in Harbottle v. Terry, where the Court was dealing with an artificial construction, but in the present case there is nothing of the kind, and it is therefore perfectly distinguishable from that case. It is also distinguishable from the earlier case of Merrieks v. Cadwallader, for in that case there were a number of streams which were mentioned as confluent of the Severn, there the ground word "tributary" was used and the Court thought they ought to apply it as being ejusdem generis with the word confluent. It is clear to my mind that the larger language of the present order was adopted in consequence of that decision.—p. 230.

Mather v. Fraser (1865) 2 Kay & J 536, 25 L J Ch 361, 2 Jur. (N.S.) 900; 4 W R. 387, WOOD, V.C.—This consideration disposes of the decision—I do not say, of the dictum—in Hollawell v. Eastwood. For the decision in that case there was abundant ground, irrespective of the dictum. The tenant had annexed to the freehold property which as between him and his landlord, would have been held, on a determination of the lease, to be chattel property, which the tenant was entitled to remove. The landlord sought to distrain. There would have been a manifest inconsistency in holding such property exempt from distress, on the ground of of cases ending with that of Fisher v. Dixon (12 Cl. & F 312), which does not appear to have been cited in Hollawell v. Eastwood, could not have been present to the mind of the learned judge to whom that dictum is attributed—p 549.

HANNEN, J. (for the Court).—It is observable that Hollawell v. Eastwood was decided before any of the cases to which we have referred (Mather v. Fraser, Walsley v. Milne (7 C B (N.S.) 115, 29 L J C. P. 97), Cullwick v. Swindell (L R. 3 Eq. 249), Olimie v. Wood (L R. 3 Ex. 257, L R. 4 Ex. 328)), and was cited in all or most of them, but not followed in any. On the contrary, it was distinguished in Mather v. Fraser by the present Lord Chancellor (Hatherley), then Vice-Chancellor, who observed that it was a case between landlord and tenant, and was altogether inapplicable to the question whether machines fixed by an owner of the soil passed to a mortgagee of the freehold. In that case machinery fixed in the same manner as the machines in Hollawell v. Eastwood was considered to pass to a mortgagee as fixtures; and so also in Walsley v. Milne, the fact that the machinery was so fastened as to admit of severance without injury to the building, or the things fixed was also disregarded by the Court; as were also in Olimie v. Wood, the special additional facts found by the jury, that the object of annexation was for the more convenient use of the things fixed, and not to improve the inheritance (p. 137). We think that the case of Hollawell v. Eastwood was well distinguished from cases like the present in question depended mainly upon (1) the mode and extent of annexation to the soil or fabric of the house whether it can easily be removed integro, salve et commodum or not without injury to itself or the fabric of the building. (2) whether it was for permanent and substantial improvement in the dwelling, or merely for a temporary purpose.] does state the true principles, though it may be questioned if they were in that case correctly applied to the facts (p. 387). But there is another view of the matter which weighs strongly with us. Hellawell v. Eastwood was a decision between landlord and tenant, not so likely to influence those who advance money on mortgage as Mather v. Fraser, which was decided in 1856, and has been acted upon in Bayly v. Shorebrook (L. R. 5 Eq. 72) by the Court of Queen's Bench in Longbottom v. Berry, and in Ireland in Re Dawson (J. L. R. 2 Eq. 222). These cases are too recent to have been themselves much acted upon, but they show that Mather v. Fraser has been generally adopted as the ruling case. We cannot, therefore, doubt that much money has, during the last sixteen years, been advanced on the faith of the decision in Mather v. Fraser. It is of great importance that the law as to what is the security of the mortgage should be settled; and without going so far as to say that a decision only sixteen years old should be upheld, right or wrong, on the principle that communis error facit jus, we feel that it should not be reversed unless we clearly see that it is wrong. As already said, we are rather inclined to think that, if it were res integra, we should find the same way — p. 340

BRETTE, M.R.—In the consideration of law the machines are part of the land, and those belts were fixed to the machines and were part of the land: for everything which is a necessary part of the machine is part of the land, and passes under the mortgage, and no registration is required. I think that Longbottom v. Berry is right. The judgment of Field, J. (in the Court below) is inconsistent with it; he evidently thought it wrong. It is, however, a decision which must be followed. The learned judge seems to think that the decision in Longbottom v. Berry proceeded on the admitted facts in that case. I decline to follow that view. I think that a principle of law was laid down which must be observed in subsequent cases.—p. 361

(for the Court).—There can be no doubt upon a mortgage in fee of the land, that as between the mortgagee and mortgagee, the mortgagee is entitled to all fixtures which may be upon the land whether placed there before or after the mortgage. If North, J., in the passage in his judgment which has been referred to in Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Co., meant to hold otherwise, in our opinion he was in error; but we doubt if he intended so to hold. The case of Gough v. Wood & Co., decided in this Court, in no way assists the plaintiff, and has no application to the present case. That case was decided solely upon the ground that the mortgagee had acquiesced in the removal by the mortgagor during his tenancy of trade fixtures.  tural design of the hall and staircase and put in as such, as distinguished from mere ornaments.
 Can anybody say that these birds, which were while they were there, were put there as part of the architectural design of the room? See what that means. Suppose a bird gets moth-eaten, if it is a fixture it cannot be taken out, but must be left to rot and be eaten up by maggots. That cannot be.—p. 707.

 LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—
 The Nisi Prius case of Dean v. Allalloy is a case of the erection and removal by the tenant of two sheds, called Dutch barns, which were, I will assume, unquestionably fixtures. . . . Lord Kenyon there uniformly mentions the benefit of trade, as if it were a building subservient to some purposes of trade; and never mentions agriculture, for the purposes of which it was erected. He certainly seems, however, to have thought that buildings erected by tenants for the purposes of farming were, or rather ought to be, governed by the same rules which had been so long judiciously holden to apply in the case of buildings for the purposes of trade. But the case of buildings for trade has been always put and recognised as a bonum, allowed, exception from the general rule which obtains as to other buildings, and the circumstance of its being so treated and considered establishes the existence of the general rule to which it is considered as an exception.—

COZENS-HARDY, J.—I am not satisfied that Lord

 Lord Kenyon's view [in Penton v. Robert], so far as market gardeners were concerned. If, however, there be any difference between Lord Kenyon and Lord Ellenborough, I prefer the view that glass-houses erected by a nurseryman for the purpose of carrying on his trade may be removed.
 The dicta of Lord Bramwell in Wake v. Hall (8 App. Cas. 210) support this view. Moreover, the whole tendency of the Courts in recent years, has been to enlarge the rights of tenants in respect of fixtures. Nor do I consider that there is anything in the judgment of Kindersley, V.-C. in Whitehead v. Bennett which ought to lead me to a contrary conclusion.

JESSEL, M.R.—In no way, as it appears to me, does the decision, or any of the grounds of decision, in Attwood v. Hughes v. Twissell (1886) 55 L. J. Ch. 181, 54 L. T. 470, 31 W. R. 498.

NORTH, J.—It is said that if a thing is likely to be material towards inducing a man to enter into a contract, it is a presumption of law that it was material; and Mr. Clare referred to Redgrave v. Hurd, where the late Master of the Rolls is reported to have said (at p. 21).—"If it is a material representation calculated to induce him to enter into the contract, it is an inference of law that he was induced by the representation to enter into it, and in order to take away his title to be relieved from the contract on the ground that the representation was untrue, it must be shown either that he had knowledge of the facts contrary to the representation, or that he stated in terms, or showed clearly by his conduct, that he did not rely on the representation." The next case is Smith v. Chadwick (20 Ch. D. 27), where, at p. 44, the M.R. says—"Again, on the question of the materiality of the statement, if the Court sees, on the face of it, that it is of such a nature as would induce a person to enter into the contract . . . the inference is, if he entered into the contract that he acted on the inducement so held out, and you want no evidence that he did so act." The same case came before the House of Lords (9 App. Cas. 187; 32 W. R. 687), and at p. 196 Lord Blackburn makes these remarks—"I think that, if it is proved that the defendants, with a view to induce the plaintiff to enter into a contract, made a statement to the plaintiff of such a nature as would be likely to induce a person to enter into a contract, and it is proved that the plaintiff did enter into the contract, it is a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the statement. In Redgrave v. Hurd, the late Master of the Rolls is reported to have said, that it was an inference of law. If he really meant this, he retracts it in his observations in the present case." Then, again, in another case of Smith v. Land and House Property Corporation (28 Ch. D. 16), Bowen, L.J. says—"I cannot quite agree with the remark of the late Master of the Rolls in Redgrave v. Hurd—that, if a material representation calculated to induce a person to enter into a contract is made to him, it is an inference of law that he was induced by the representations to enter into it, and I think that probably his lordship hardly intended to go so far as that, though there may be strong reason for drawing such an inference as an inference of fact." Now, looking at these cases as stating the law correctly, I come to the conclusion that it is not a presumption of law, but an important piece of evidence from which, if there is nothing else, the Court may draw the inference of fact that the plaintiff was induced by the statement to enter into the contract.

[It was pointed out during the argument that the words "of law" in the phrase "it is an inference of law," in the judgment in Redgrave v. Hurd, occur only in 20 Ch. D. 21, and not in any of the contemporaneous reports.]

Redgrave v. Hurd, discussed.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is said that the injured party is entitled to be replaced in status quo. It seems to me that when you are dealing with innocent misrepresentation you must understand that proposition that he is to be replaced in status quo with this limitation—that he is not to be replaced in exactly the same position in all respects, otherwise he would be entitled to recover damages, but is to be replaced in his position so far as regards the rights and obligations which have been created by the contract into which he has been induced to enter. That seems to me to be the true doctrine, and I think it is put in the neatest way in Redgrave v. Hurd. In that case there was a misrepresentation, but, though there was a suggestion of fraud in the pleadings, the C.A. thought that fraud was not so expressly pleaded as to enable the Court to treat the case as one of fraud, and that the relief given must depend on misrepresentation alone. The M.R., so treating it, says: "Before going into the details . . . belief that it was true." With great respect for the shadow and memory of that great name, I cannot help saying that this is not a perfect exposition of what the common law was, but, so far as the rule of equity goes, I must assume that the M.R. spoke with full knowledge of the equity authorities, and he treats the relief as being the giving back by the party who made the misrepresentation of the advantages he obtained by the contract. Now these advantages may be of two kinds. He may get an advantage in the shape of an actual benefit, as when he receives money, or he may also get an advantage if the party with whom he contracts assumes some burden in consideration of the contract. In such a case it seems to me that complete rescission would not be effected unless the misrepresenting party not only hands back the benefits which he has himself received—but also re-assumes the burden which under the contract the injured person has taken upon himself. Speaking only for myself, I should not like to lay down the proposition that a person is to be restored to the position which he held before the misrepresentation was made, nor that the person injured must be indemnified against loss which arises out of the contract, unless you place upon the words "out of the contract" the limited and special meaning which I have endeavoured to shadow forth. Loss arising out of the contract is a term which would be too wide. It would embrace damages at common law, because damages at common law are only given upon the supposition that they are damages which would naturally and reasonably follow from the injury done. I think Redgrave v. Hurd shows that it would be too wide, because in that case the Court excluded from the relief which was given the damages which had been sustained by the plaintiff in removing his business, and other similar items. There ought, as it appears to me, to be a giving back and a taking back on both sides, including the giving back and taking back of the obligations which the contract has created, as well as the giving back and taking back of the advantages. There is nothing in Rawlinson v. Wickham (3 De G. & J. 304, see post, "PARTNERSHIP") which carries the doctrine beyond that. In that case, one of three partners having retired, the remaining partners introduced the plaintiff into the firm, and he, under his contract with them, took upon himself to share with them the liabilities which otherwise they would have borne in their entirety. That was a burden which he took under the contract and in virtue of the contract. It seems to me, therefore, that upon this principle indemnity was rightly decreed as regards the liabilities of the new firm.

All that I understand the L.C. to mean is this—That where no peculiar relations of a fiduciary character exist between the vendor and the vendee, the fact of the seller not employing any solicitor does not shift the burden, and not that it is not a material circumstance to be regarded in the transaction that he had not a solicitor on his part who would be likely to explain the matter fully to him—p. 291.

HARDWICKE, L.C.—In Glassen v. Odgen, before King, L.C., that circumstance [viz. that it was a recovery obtained by a father from his child] was strongly insisted upon; but his lordship refused to give relief, for he said it was a fair bargain between a father and his child, and he would not weigh in golden scales whether the consideration was exactly equal or not. In March, 1731, there was an appeal to the H. L. from that decree, upon the appeal the Lords laid great weight upon that circumstance, that the conveyance was obtained by a father from his daughter in distress and the decree of Lord King was reversed—p. 258

SELBORNE, L.C.—In Rhodes v. Bate it was laid down in clear terms that, in order to uphold a gift made to a person standing in a confidential relation, the donor must have had competent undoubtedly the rule, so long as the confidential relation exists; but it is not laid down in Rhodes

v. Bate that advice of that kind is necessary

when the confidential relation has come to an end,

BACON, V.-C.—Upon grounds of public policy it may be right that a needy, improvident youth who desires to raise money upon his expectancy for the purpose of discharging debts contracted in his nonage, or to furnish him with the means of indulging in luxury and extravagances, ought to be protected against the sordid and corrupt practices of persons who seek to make a profit out of such a man's inexperience, but this principle must be, as it always has been, applied with caution, and it has never yet been held that an expectant heir was incompetent to deal with his interests for substantial purposes, or that the persons dealing with him could have their transactions impeached unless there was something so morally wrong as to make it necessary to discontinue their dealings upon grounds of public policy. It may be thought that some of the older cases went too far, and of this opinion was Lord Brougham, who in Lord Aldborough v Trye not only expressed doubts about the rule supposed to be deduced from Gowland v. De Faria (17 Ves 20), but observes that if any such rule was universally applicable, it would render an expectant heir unable to sell or deal with his expectancies at all

STUART, V.-C.—The rule [in Edwards v. Burt] had been reduced to an absurdity, for it had been said, that it was impossible to purchase a reversionary interest with safety, except under a sale by auction. That was, in short, the result of the decision in Edwards v. Burt—a result opposed to the understanding of every lawyer and man of common sense, and it was not to be wondered at that Lord St Leonards, in his 14th edition of Vendors and Purchasers, at p. 279, should say, after expressing his dissatisfaction with the rule, that that decision was much to be regretted.—p. 525.

MONAHAN, C.J.—We cannot distinguish this case from Wood v Dixie. In that case, it might have been argued, as was done here, that notice to the grantee brings him within the statute. We think it is inferable from those cases that that view of the case was taken into consideration and decided upon. The words "intention to defeat" in Lord Denman's judgment in Wood v Dixie refer, we think, to the intention of both parties.—pp 863, 864. KEOGH and O'HAGAN, JJ. concur.

SIR M. MORRIS—I do not quarrel with the decision in that case. It decides that it was a wrong direction for the judge to give the jury, that the mere attempt to defeat one particular creditor, where money passed, and everything was bona fide, made the conveyance of the property void under the statute of Elizabeth. The decision is only that on the facts of the case the direction was bad. Why? Because the statute does not say that the deed shall be avoided when it constitutes a fraud that would defeat the creditors. But that implies that it is a fraud, and that it would defeat creditors. The Court only laid down in that case, as I understand it, that the mere defeating of a creditor was not sufficient to warrant such a direction by the judge, although it might afford good evidence for the jury to act on. But now, even taking that distinction, which goes to the very marrow of Wood v. Dine—a case which I think has often been cited to support propositions which it does not support—is there not here a parting with the £25 10s. for no good consideration at all? In Wood v. Dine there was a good consideration. . . . The £25 10s. was parted with for no consideration, and the £117 has followed suit with the £25 10s.—pp. 59, 51

FOLLOCK, B.—The case before us is not like that of Spencer v. Slater, for there is this great distinction, that here the primary object was a transfer for purposes of sale as a going concern, and not for the purpose of carrying on the business (p. 51). . . . In Spencer v. Slater there was special circumstances. In the first place the deed contained not merely the ordinary resulting trusts as to the surplus which would be found in every deed, but a resulting trust, under which, at the expiration of twelve months, the debtor might apply to the trustees to be paid the dividends of creditors who neglected or refused to assent to or execute the deed, and then if the creditors did not within seven days assent or execute, the money was to be paid to the debtor. This was clearly much beyond the ordinary resulting trust, and then again, as I have already mentioned in that case, the primary trust was to carry on the business; here the principal object is to sell the business; and it is subsidiary to that object that power should be given to carry it on till the sale. In that case, too, there was a very special and general indemnity. It is quite right that trustees should be indemnified in certain cases, such, for instance, as their having to endorse bills of exchange, and that is what is found in this case. The indemnity in Spencer v. Slater went very much further, and, from all circumstances of that case taken together, the Court came to the conclusion that they ought to draw the inference that the assignment was intended to defeat creditors, and was therefore void under the statute of Elizabeth. The circumstances here are, as I have pointed out, very different, and would not warrant us in arriving at the same conclusion—p. 52.

ALVERSTON, C.J.—It is contended that the deed is void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, as tending to defeat and delay the execution creditors, because upon the face of it it reserves certain benefits for the debtor himself. In support of this contention Spencer v. Slater was cited, where the Court had to consider the effect of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5 upon the validity of a deed which had been made in order to prevent an execution. That case cannot be regarded as laying down any general principle apart from its particular facts. It was not so considered in Boldero v. London, &c. Discount Co. It was decided without reference to Alton v Harrison, and is difficult to reconcile with that case and many others, if it decides that any benefit reserved to the debtor makes the deed void. The question is, is the deed a bona fide deed of arrangement, or is it a mere cloak to cover a very different transaction? If it is bona fide, then it is a good deed and not void within the statute of Elizabeth. Many composition deeds provide that the debtor's business may be carried on by him, and receive some ultimate benefit to the debtor. We are asked to say that all such deeds are bad on the face of them as against creditors who do not assent. I am not prepared to do so. Alton v. Harrison was recognised in Boldero v. London, &c. Discount Co., and the result is that the mere omission of the execution creditors from this deed, although intentional, does not invalidate the deed—p. 478.

KAY, J.—The actual decision in Prodgers v Langham was that a lease for the benefit of a daughter, if she married with her father's consent, being voluntarily, would be void against a subsequent purchaser for value by virtue of the 27 Eliz. c. 14, but although so void it might be made effectual against such purchaser by a subsequent marriage of the daughter upon the faith of it. This seems to have proceeded upon the ground that the subsequent consideration of the marriage related back as though the settlement had been made upon the marriage. George v. Milbanke (9 Ves. 190) was a contest between the creditor of an appointor—who in his lifetime had exercised a general power of appointment over a fund in favour of a volunteer—and a purchaser after his death from the volunteer of £500, part of the appointed fund. By the equitable rule the exercise of the power made the appointed fund assets to pay debts of the appointor. Lord Eldon after much consideration held that the purchaser of the £500 had the better equity. There was no question under either 18 Eliz. c. 5 or 27 Eliz. c. 4, and Lord Eldon, treating Prodgers v Langham as a binding authority, and saying that there had been frequent decisions according to that case, points out that the purchaser there had the legal estate, which looks as though he regarded it as a decision under the equitable doctrine that the Court shall not take the legal estate from an innocent purchaser. In Payne v Mortimer (4 De G. & J. 447), Turner, L.J. in his judgment says this: "It was not denied by creditors of the settlor." This seems to be a clear recognition by Turner, L.J. that sect. 6 of 18 Eliz. c. 5 does protect a purchaser for value without notice of the interest devised under a settlement which the statute would make void against creditors as to other persons claiming under it.

HATHLELEY, L.C.—The Vice-Chancellor seems to have felt himself very much pressed by the case of Sprett v Willows and the dicta of Lord Westbury in that case. The first of those dicta is (3 D. J. & S. 802) "If the debt of the creditor by whom the voluntary settlement is impeached existed at the date of the settlement, and it is shown that the remedy of the creditor is defeated or delayed by the existence of the settlement, it is immaterial whether the debtor was or was not solvent after making the settlement." The Vice-Chancellor seems to have thought himself bound by this expression of opinion, and to have set aside the settlement upon that ground alone. It is clear, however, that this expression of opinion on the part of the Lord Chancellor was by no means necessary for the decision of the case before him, where the settlor was guilty of a plain and manifest fraud. It is expressed in very large terms, probably too large—p. 543.

GIFFARD, L.J.—In this case I quite agree with the Vice-Chancellor in thinking that if the propositions laid down in Sprett v Willows are taken as abstract propositions, they go too far and beyond what the law is, but if they are taken in connection with the facts of that case, then undoubtedly there is abundantly enough to support the decision; for there was a voluntary settlement by a man who at its date was solvent, but immediately afterwards realised the rest of his property and demanded himself of everything. Of course the irresistible conclusion from that was, that the voluntary settlement was intended to defeat the subsequent creditors. That being so I do not think the Vice-Chancellor need have felt any difficulty about the case of Sprett v Willows, but he seems to have considered that in order to defeat a voluntary settlement there must be proof of an actual and express intent to defeat creditors. That, however, is not so—p. 544.

BRETT, L.J.—With one exception, none of the authorities cited before us in the least militate against our decision. They all seem to show that the fraud of a party to a suit is an extrinsic and collateral act which will vitiate the judgment. The exception is to be found in the doubts expressed by James, L.J., with the assent of Thesiger, L.J., in Flower v Lloyd. It seems to me that the fraud alleged in that action was probably fraud on the part of certain servants of the party, and not fraud brought home to the party himself, moreover, it was, as I understand fraud committed, not before the Court itself at the trial of the action, but previously to the only being brought to a hearing before the Court. It is to be taken that the doubts of James and Thesiger, L.JJ. related to a fraud of a party to the action committed before the Court itself for the purpose of deceiving the Court, I cannot, after having heard the pre-ent argument, agree with the doubts expressed by them. These doubts are not binding, and no decision as to the effect of fraud was pronounced by these lords justices in Flower v Lloyd—p 807

FRY, J.—“There is one other observation which I ought to make before parting with this part of the case [i.e., fraud and voidance of the mortgage], viz., that Exton v Scott appears to me not to be an authority governing the present case, for the reason pointed out by Mr. Cookson. There the grantor was not insolvent when he executed the deed, and he remained in a state of solvency for twelve years afterwards. If authority were wanted in support of a principle so common as to that to which their lordships have adverted, it may be found in the case which is referred to in the judgment of the Court below (*Clarke v. MacKay v. Douglas (1872) 41 L. J. Ch. 539, L. R. 14 Eq. 106; 26 L. T. 721; 20 W. R. 652—v-c, approved and followed

JESSEL, M.R.—“The principle of MacKay v. Douglas and that line of cases is this, that a man is not entitled to go into a hazardous business, and immediately before doing so settle all his property voluntarily, the object being this: ‘If I succeed in business, I make a fortune for myself. If I fail I leave my creditors unpaid. They will bear the loss.’ That is the very thing which the statute of Elizabeth was meant to prevent. The object of the settlor was to put his property out of the reach of his future creditors. He contemplated engaging in this new trade, and he wanted to preserve his property from his future creditors. That cannot be done by a voluntary settlement. That is, to my mind, a clear and satisfactory principle (p. 598). . . [In the present case] his object was to make himself safe against that eventuality [non-success of the business], and, if that was his object, then I think the principle of MacKay v. Douglas applies, and that the deed was void also under the statute of Elizabeth—p. 599

STUART, V.-C.—I have already said in the course of the argument that there is a great mistake in the marginal epitome of that case, and that there is not one word in Lord Cottenham’s judgment to justify so extraordinary a proposition as that this Court will not interfere against a possession fraudulently taken, whether the works are constructed or not. Looking at Lord Cottenham’s judgment the grounds of it appear perfectly plain. The case of Deere v. Guest was decided on demurrer, and the only question was whether, on the allegations in the bill, there was enough to show that the plaintiff would be entitled, on his case stated, to relief in a Court of equity; and Lord Cottonham thought not, because what was claimed by the defendants was simply a right of way, and the case stated by the bill was a state of mere trespass, and upon that ground, on demurrer, he affirmed the judgment of the V-C of England by which the demurrer was allowed.

SALDORN, L.C.—The other class of cases is that exemplified by Deere v. Guest, which, when rightly considered, amounted to neither more nor less than an action of ejectment brought in the Court of Chancery without any equitable circumstances to induce that Court to assume jurisdiction. [His lordship having stated the facts, continued.] In that state of circumstances Lord Cottonham thought—and in my judgment was quite right in thinking—that there was no equity to interfere, and that the case was a simple attempt to transfer the jurisdiction in ejectment from law to equity.—p. 225

ELDON, L.C.—It is almost impossible at this day to say anything having a tendency to shake it [the above case], but I know Grose, J. very lately held the same opinion as he did at the time of the judgment. The doctrine laid down in that case is in practice and experience most dangerous.—p. 186.

ERSKINE, L.C.—With regard to Pasley v. Freeman, a considerable difference of opinion prevails; and some of the most correct judgments appear to me to have been surprised. My opinion upon this species of action does not concur with that of Lord Eldon as expressed in the case of Evans v. Bicknell, which opinion, against that action, I know his lordship constantly held in the Court of Common Pleas. The mistake of those who invade the principle of that action, consists in this. The proposition is not, that, if a man asked, whether a third person may be trusted, answers, "you may trust him, he is a very honest man, and worthy of trust," an action will lie, if he proves otherwise. There must be the knowledge at the time. That is the sound principle; that the defendant knowing that person to be dishonest, insolvent, and unworthy of trust, made the representation, and that is the subject of an action, or of a bill in equity, where it is necessary and fit, that equity should interpose the concurrent jurisdiction. . . . That case of Pasley v. Freeman, therefore, stands upon the clearest principles of jurisprudence.—p. 182.

LORD HERSHELL.—I think the authorities establish the following propositions. First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. . . . Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial.

ESHER, M.R.—Before the passing of the Friendly Societies Act, 1895, it was held in Willis v Wells, following the decisions in Prentice v London and Morvay v Glover (1810) 19 L J. Ex. 20, 4 Ex. 430, 14 J P. 81.—IX And see "BUILDING SOCIETY," under earlier Acts, that under sect. 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, where a dispute arose between a person who had been a member of a registered society and the society, as to whether the society had a right to expel him, which they had assumed to do, the dispute was not one which had to be decided by virtue of the section in the manner directed by the rules of the society, and that the jurisdiction of the High Court was not ousted. For the reasons given in those cases I am of opinion that they were rightly decided. . . Those decisions really come to this—that if a society chooses to expel a member, it is estopped from afterwards saying that he is a member, and therefore bound by the rules. . . The decisions are equally applicable under the later Act (Friendly Societies Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25), s. 10), and the plaintiff cannot be shut out from his right to have the dispute adjudicated upon by the High Court.—p. 239

POLLOCK, D. and KENNEDY, J.
ESHER, M.R.—The Divisional Court have treated the matter as a case within the judgment in Reg. v. Grant. I think the Court misconstrued the decision in that case, for the jurisdiction of the arbitrators thus depended upon a condition precedent which must have existed before they could enter upon the arbitration so as to decide it. The justices were therefore right in inquiring into those preceding facts, in order to determine whether they existed, so as to give them jurisdiction or not. That is not the case here. There is no such preliminary fact to be inquired into.—p. 111.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—As animals feræ naturæ when killed or reduced into possession by the owner of land where they are found, or by his authority, become instantly his property, does the unauthorised act of a trespasser by the very fact of killing them, convert them at once to the use of the owner of the land? To this question Lord Holt, according to the case which he puts in Sutton v. Moody, would have given a distinct answer, that provided the game was both started and killed on the ground of the same owner, the property would be in him. . . But I cannot so easily discover the principle upon which he proceeds when he said, that "if A starts a hare on the ground of B, and hunts it into the ground of C and kills it there, the property is in A, the hunter, but A is liable to an action of trespass for hunting in the grounds as well of B, as of C". . . It would appear to me to be more in accordance with principle, to hold that, if the trespasser deprived the owner of the land where the game was started, of his right to claim the property, by unlawfully killing it on the land of another to which he had driven it, he converted it into a subject of property for that other owner, and not for himself. But the first proposition started by Lord Holt, with respect to game started and killed on the land of the same owner, is free from all difficulty, and is sufficient to dispose of the present question. The case of Sutton v. Moody has always been regarded as an authority on this point, and as far as I can ascertain, has never been questioned. It was recognised in Churchward v. Studdy (14 East 210), in Grashaw v. Ewart (11 Ex. 328, 1 H. & N. 560; 7 H. L. Cas. 331); by Martin, B. in Rigg v. Lord Lowdale (11 Ex. 654); and in this last case when before the Court of Error (1 H. & N. 923). Coleridge, J. said, "The grouse shot" (i.e., shot by the defendant, a wrongdoer) "on the land of the plaintiff, belonged to him according to all the authorities"—p. 639.

A L SMITH, LJ—In my judgment the Act [Ground Game Act, 1881] was passed throughout in the interests of tenants, and of tenants alone, and can only be brought into play in cases where a landlord and an agricultural tenant both exist, and then interests with regard to the ground game are antagonistic. That was the view of the Act taken by Mathew, J and myself in Smith v Hunt.—p 717.

WILLIAMS, LJ—The statute provided that the occupier should always have the right given by sect. 1 to kill and take ground game, and that that statutory right should be inseparable from the occupation of the land. It is quite true that the right is given subject to limitations and conditions, and I quite agree that these limitations and conditions are wholly inapplicable to the case of a landowner occupying his own land and retaining the right of shooting. It is for that reason that I think that Smith v Hunt was absolutely correctly decided. . . But where a landlord in occupation of his own land has parted with the right of shooting I cannot see that the conditions are inapplicable. In such a case it seems to me that the landlord occupier is entitled to the statutory right to kill game, and that the conditions are not only not applicable, but are proper.—p 718

LORD HERSCHILL—It (Keeble v Hickeringill) is, however, treated in their opinions by the majority of the learned judges as establishing the wide and far-reaching proposition that every man has a right to pursue his trade or calling without molestation or obstruction, and that anyone who by any act, though it be not otherwise unlawful, molests or obstructs him is guilty of a wrong unless he can show lawful justification or excuse for so doing. The case of Keeble v Hickeringill was decided about two centuries ago, but I cannot find that it has ever been treated, unless it be quite recently, as establishing the broad general proposition alleged. . . Carrington v Taylor was also relied on by the respondents. It is, I believe, the only case which has been expressly based on Keeble v Hickeringill. The plaintiff there possessed an ancient decoy, and the defendant sought his livelihood by shooting wild fowl from a boat on the water, for which boat with small arms, he had a licence from the Admiralty for fishing and coasting along the shores of Essex. The decoy was near a salt creek where the tide ebbs and flows. The only proof of disturbance of the decoy by the defendant was that, being in his boat shooting wild fowl in a part of the open creek, he had fired his fowling-piece, first within a quarter of a mile of the decoy and afterwards within 200 yards of it, and had killed several wildgeese. The judge left these facts to the jury as evidence of a wilful disturbance of the plaintiff's decoy by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for 40s. damages, and the Court, on the motion for a new trial, refused to disturb the verdict. They gave no reasons for their judgment. Unless a decoy possesses some peculiar privileges in the eye of the law, I confess myself quite unable to understand why the defendant was liable to an action or was not within his rights in shooting the wild fowl at the place he did for the purpose of gaining a livelihood, which is stated to have been his object. In any case the decision affords no support to the contention now under consideration.

SMITH, J—In Turner v Morgan there was no search, but Brett, J is reported to have repeated what he said in the former case (Clarke v Crowder). But it was not necessary in this last-mentioned case to decide whether the seisure and detainer must be in a highway, for there was no finding of game on the appellant, and consequently no legal seizure and detainer at all. The game was found in the possession of some one else, and none of the matters required to give jurisdiction existed. I think that if Brett, J.

and had the effect of such a decision—namely, but the statute would be rendered nugatory in the way I have pointed out [by making it possible for a man who has been scatched to evade the statute by afterwards throwing the game over a hedge, or into a ditch by the side of the highway]—present to his mind, he would not have used the expressions he is reported to have used.—p. 729

This was held not to be the case of an action upon a contract by way of wagering, but of one brought upon a cheque, given for money received by the defendant for which he was liable to account to the plaintiff. Johnson v. Lansley (12 C. B. 168), was a similar case, and is no authority for the plaintiff in the present case, who sues upon the contract itself.—p. 79.

JESSEL, M. R.—I must say, speaking with some hesitation, as I always do, when differing from any judgment of Lord Cottenham's, that that reasoning, to my mind, is inconclusive and unsatisfactory. The notion that because a transaction which is illegal is closed, that therefore a Court of equity is to interfere in dividing the proceeds of the illegal transaction, is not only opposed to principle but to authority—to authority in the well-known case of highwaymen where a robbery had been committed, and one highwayman unsuccessfully sued the other for a division of the proceeds of the robbery. So in the case he puts of one of two partners engaged in merchant trade. As I read it, he meant the trade of smuggling goods. If two persons go partners as smugglers, can one maintain a bill against the other to have an account of the smuggling transactions? I should say certainly not. It is not sufficient to say that the transaction is concluded as a reason for the interference of the Court. If that were the reason, it would be lending the aid of the Court to assert the rights of the parties in carrying out and completing an illegal contract. If the partnership is for the purpose of smuggling, that is an illegal contract, and the Court cannot maintain it, and the Court will not lend its aid at all to it. That reasoning, then, of Lord Cottenham is not sufficient, and I should have answered the question—not as Lord Cottenham does, in the affirmative—but in the negative. I do not say that this observation at all affects the authority of Sharp v. Taylor as it stands, but I think it does affect very much the dicta which I have read from the judgment, and that is the reason I have read them. It is no part of the duty of a Court of justice to aid either in carrying out an illegal contract, or in dividing the proceeds arising from an illegal contract, between the parties to that illegal contract. In my opinion, no action can be maintained for the one purpose more than for the other.—p. 194

BRETT, M. R.—The case of Beyer v. Adams is the only one in favour of the argument which has been urged on behalf of the defendant, and the time has now come when, unless some distinction (which I do not see) can be found between it and the other authorities to which I have referred, that case can no longer stand. In my opinion the decision there was a wrong one, and must be overruled. Its doctrine was well challenged by the case of Beeston v. Beeston. In that case, which is to be found much more fully reported in 33 L. T. 700, Amplett, B. cites Sharp v. Taylor, and shows that what was held in Beyer v. Adams was inconsistent with what Lord Cottenham decided in Sharp v. Taylor, so that Beyer v. Adams was really overruled before it was decided, and it has never since been acted on or followed.—p. 366

Duggle v Higgs (1877) 2 Ex. D. 422, 46 L. J. Ex. 721; 87 L. T. 27; 25 W. R. 777.—C.A. CAIRNS, L.C.—There is no authority in favour of the view of the defendant except Batty v Marriott, and if that authority is to be followed it cannot be denied it is a very strong authority for the defendant. What the Court had in their minds in that case was the question whether the game was a lawful or an unlawful game, and having come to the conclusion that it was a lawful game, they were of opinion that there was nothing in the case which was struck at by the Act of Parliament, and that the Act was only intended to strike at unlawful games. That view seems to me to be erroneous, and I think the Court overlooked the first part of the section, which applies to all contracts, lawful or unlawful, by way of gaming or wagering. When Baton v Newman came before this Court, although there was a certain degree of difference between that case and Batty v Marriott, yet it is obvious that Batty v Marriott did not meet with approval. I cannot follow that case.—p. 127.

Trumble v Hild (1879) 5 App. Cas. 342, 40 L. J. P. C. 40; 42 L. T. 103; 28 W. L. 479.—P.C. SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for J. C.).—The meaning of this proviso (exempting from the enactment "any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise") has been considered in several cases in the English Courts. In Batty v Marriott, where an agreement analogous to the present was made and money deposited to abate the event of a foot-race, it was held that, a foot-race being a legal pastime, the agreement was within the proviso. This decision did not meet with entire acquiescence when it was brought before the Courts in subsequent cases. It is unnecessary to refer to those cases, because the decision itself has been distinctly overruled by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Duggle v Higgs. In that case the agreement related to a walking match, and was to the same effect as that in the present action. It was decided that an agreement of this kind, being a contract of wager, was not an agreement to subscribe or contribute for or towards any prize or sum of money within the true meaning of the proviso, which it was held applied to subscriptions and contributions other than wagers. It is not disputed by the two judges forming the majority in the Court below, that this decision was directly in point; but their own opinions not agreeing with it, they declined to follow its authority. Their lordships think the Court in the colony might well have taken this decision as an authoritative construction of the statute. It is the judgment of the Court of Appeal, by which all the Courts in England are bound until a contrary determination has been arrived at by the House of Lords. Their lordships think that in colonies, where a like enactment has been passed by the Legislature, the colonial Courts should also govern themselves by it. The judges of the Supreme Court, who differed from the Chief Justice, were evidently reluctant to depart from their own previous decision in a case of Hogan v. Curtis (5 Sup. Court Rep. 292), but they might well have yielded to the high authority of the Court of Appeal which decided the case of Diggle v. Higgs, as the English Court which decided Batty v. Marriot would have felt bound to do if a similar case had again come before it. Their lordships would not have felt themselves justified in advising her Majesty to depart from the decision in Diggle v. Higgs unless they entertained a clear opinion that the construction it has given to the proviso in question was wrong, and had not settled the law; since in their view it is of the utmost importance that in all parts of the empire where English law prevails, the interpretation of that law by the Courts should be as nearly as possible the same. Their lordships, however, do not dissent from, nor do they desire to express any doubt as to the correctness of that decision, which, it may be assumed, has settled the vexed question of construction of a not very intelligible enactment. Diggle v. Higgs also decided that the statute does not preclude the party who has revoked the authority given to the stakeholder from recovering the money he has deposited; the Court of Appeal agreeing with a previous decision to the same effect of the Court of Queen's Bench in Hampden v. Walsh (1 Q. B. D. 189)—p. 344.

MANFIELD, C.J. (for the Court).—I must take notice of one case, a very strong one, Lacausade v. White, where the Court said that it was more consonant to policy that money paid on an illegal contract might be recovered back, than that it should be retained. That was a strong case certainly in favour of the present defendant; but this doctrine is directly contrary to what Lord Kenyon, C.J. said afterwards in Hinson v. Hancock (8 T. R. 675), where he seems to have entirely forgotten Lacausade v. White. Lord Kenyon there says, "There is no case to be found where, when money has been actually paid by one of two parties to the other upon an illegal contract, both being parties criminæ, an action has been maintained to recover it back again." Now this is directly contrary to Lacausade v. White, and he afterwards says that Hinson v. Hancock is very different from that case, which he says "was the case of a stake recovered from a stakeholder before it had been paid over." But here he certainly mistook Lacausade v. White entirely, for there is no stakeholder in the case, nor anything like it, and in 1 East 96 (Vandegh v. Hewitt), it was said by Lord Kenyon that the rule had been settled in all times that where both parties were in pari delicto, potior est conditio possidentis. I mention these cases to show that the authority of Lacausade v. White is very much shaken, and cannot be relied on, and that we do not decide on the authority of that case.—p. 283.

BISHOP, M.R.—Cave J. held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the securities, but not the money. The defendants appealed to this Court, and this Court held that the judgment of Cave J. as regards the securities was right. Now the plaintiff appeals as regards the money deposit.

It seems to me that the judgment I am about to accede to must go this length, that if a person making bets with another is so foolish as to deposit money with the other party to abide the result of the bets, once the bets are decided he can never recover the money, whatever may have been the event of the wager. The party who holds the money can keep it, even though he has in fact lost the wager. That, upon the true construction of the statute, appears to me to be the result of the Gaming Act, 1845. . . I am fortified in this view by what was said by James, L.J. in Manning v. Purcell. . . Upon the ground that the provisions of the statute apply, I am obliged to decide that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in his action as regards the money deposited with the defendant.—p. 180.

LINDLEY, J.—When that case comes to be examined it will be found that it did not turn on sect. 34 at all, but on sects 4 and 5. Those sections deal with persons who use the occupiers of 'a place,' and the decision of the Court there was that the place in question—a space under a tree in Hyde Park—was not capable of occupation. No doubt some of the judges in that case seem to express a doubt whether that could be 'a place' within the meaning of the Act, but, when understood, the case does not present any difficulty.

[The question in Saffery v Mayer was whether a person who had advanced money to another for the purpose of making bets on their joint account, which money was lost on bets, was, by reason of the Gaming Act, 1892, prevented from maintaining an action against the other for half the amount lost.]

SMITH, M.R.—All that case [Thwaites v Coulthwaite] decided was that the plaintiff was entitled to an account of the profits of the partnership business, and it does not in my opinion in any way touch the question raised in the present case.

MATHEW, J.—It was urged that the decision in Whitehurst v Fincher was an authority in favour of the respondent in the present case, but in that case all that was found against the respondent, who was charged with using a room for the purpose of betting, was that three times he went to a public-house and made bets. Under such circumstances the Court was unable to come to the conclusion that the room was used for the purpose of betting within the Act, for if it had been intended to make all betting in public-houses illegal, the Act would have contained an express provision to that effect.

LINDLEY, J.—The only other case which is really material is Whitehurst v Fincher, in which it was held that the bar of a public-house was not a 'place' within the meaning of sect. 3. I confess that I felt some difficulty with regard to that case, but our attention has been drawn to what Mathew, J., who was one of the judges deciding it, said about it in Hornaby v Raggett (vide supra). . . . Snow v Hill is no authority for the respondent, since in that case the person charged did not use any definite spot, but merely walked about a field, in which racing was taking place, betting with people whom he met.

KALSBURY, J.C.—As the case of Hawke v. Dunn is said to have given rise to this litigation, I wish to examine the grounds of that decision. I am unable to accept the reasoning in that case, nor do I think it consistent with the previous authorities or with itself. In the first place I find that reliance is placed upon the fact that the bookmakers who bet are professional bookmakers. I know of no canon of construction which can introduce such words into an Act of Parliament, and certainly there are no such words here. I cannot doubt that if the prohibited thing is done, whatever that prohibited thing is, by a person who does it for the first time in his life, he is just as amenable to the law as though he had been for many years in the practice of it. Let a man open a house for such a purpose, and though he never in fact made a bet or received a deposit, though the proof might be difficult, yet the offence, if proved, would be consummated. While at the end of the judgment I find those words "The law does not forbid betting itself, nor is the business or avocation of a bookmaker necessarily illegal." But what the legislature has forbidden, and what it has pronounced to be illegal, is the use by those who make a trade and business of betting of any place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. I will not again refer to the fallacious employment of the word "use"; what I at present insist upon is the selecting of such persons indicated by the words as if the Act of Parliament had made any difference between different classes of persons, and as if professional bettors were in any different position from any other members of the public. In another part of the judgment I find the learned judge saying

"In my opinion, to limit the meaning of the words 'other place' to some other place quodam generis with a house or office would have the effect of defeating, not of forwarding, the object of the legislature, and I cannot imagine that, with the desire to suppress that kind of betting mentioned in the preamble, it was in contemplation to afford it a sort of sanctuary in a betting ring or in any other place not quodam generis with a house or office." The mischief rectified in the preamble is the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving money in advance by the owners or occupants of such houses or offices, or by other persons acting on their behalf, and the learned judge makes his meaning clear when he begins by saying that "one of the practices deemed to be objectionable and injurious was that which is known as ready-money betting—namely, that the person making the bet deposits with the bookmaker the money which he was disposed to adventure." This is again inserted by construction words which are not there—the words of the statute are "owners or occupants of such houses or offices." I certainly should have thought that if this case were to be argued upon the preamble alone, there was not much room for doubt, with the actual enacting words, however, I have myself endeavoured to deal —p. 400

LORD JAMES—I would say that I think it must be taken that the judgment of the C. A. in the present case overruled the decisions in Eastwood v. Miller, Haigh v. Shelfield Corporation, and Hawke v. Dunn—p. 416.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—It was contended that the decision in Stoddart v. Sagar is an authority against the view we are now taking, but I do not so regard it. I agree that it would have been possible for the alderman to have drawn the same conclusion of fact as was found in this case. But that the Court did not draw that conclusion is clear from the judgment of my brother Wright, who said: "No doubt it is possible that under certain circumstances such a competition as this may be a betting transaction, for a case can be suggested where the facts might be so found as to show that it was for instance," and then, although it is quite true that he quotes the words of the section, it is plain he did not feel himself justified, on the facts stated, in drawing the conclusion which Channell, J. has drawn in the case before us. I read that judgment of Wright, J. as reserving for further consideration the point which has arisen in this case. As regards Reg. v. Hobbs, I agree that there are expressions of great authority of the late J.A.C.J., to which our attention has been called, as to whether in that particular case the contingency might be said to depend on the result of horse races. There is, however, a broad distinction between that case and the present, and I cannot help thinking that that must have weighed with the Court. There was there no promise by the defendant to pay any money to anybody. No money was paid to the defendant in the proper sense of the word. He was the custodian of the money, because if he had made away with it he would have been guilty of improper conduct. But he was only the custodian of the money that other people subscribed. Caminada v. Hulton, which was referred to in Stoddart v. Sagar, may, I think, clearly be distinguished, for the reasons which have been given by more than one member of the Court in the course of the argument. [It had been pointed out that as the competitor in that case got a book, it could not be said that he paid his money only in consideration of the defendant's promise to pay him the prize.]—p. 193.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—After considering Reg. v. Stoddart I do not think that sect 7 [of the Betting Act, 1853] should be so limited in its effect as it was held to be in *Stoddart v. Held that upon the true construction of sect. 6 of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860, a gas company is prohibited from furnishing to a customer a supply of gas for the purpose of consumption by him within a district assigned to another company, notwithstanding that the meter through which the supply passes is on a part of the customer's property which is within the district; and distinguished above case on the grounds that there the supply to the customer, the G. W. Ry., was furnished under a contract entered into prior to the Act of 1860, and therefore protected by sect. 51 of the Act, that the question whether the railway would violate the Act if it supplied gas to a hotel built and demised by it had not been decided in that case, and that all that had been decided was that in the circumstances there was no ground for an injunction.

KELLY, C.B.—I do not think that we are called upon, at present, to say whether we should overrule the case of Irons v. Smallpieces, or whether a gift, not made by deed, and unaccompanied by transfer, is invalid in point of law. Whenever that question shall come before me, I feel bound to say I shall require a much higher authority than the note of an editor (we 2 M. & G. 373, n.), however learned or eminent, to induce me to overrule a decision of Lord Tenterden and his brethren in the Court of Queen's Bench. With regard to the text books which have been cited, they are founded upon cases to which they expressly refer, which contain nothing whatever to support the proposition in the form in which it is laid down. They only give the example of the case in Noy (Flowers' Case), which is quoted as showing that personal property may pass by way of gift without delivery. But it is not said how the gift was made.—p. 129.

POWLOCK, B.—The modern law on the subject is founded on Lord Tenterden's judgment in Irons v. Smallpieces. I can only say that case has been before the Courts on the Common Law side of Westminster Hall for a great many years, and I cannot myself acquiesce in the view of the law there laid down. I am not bound by that decision, because Parker, B., afterwards Lord Wensleydale, in the case of Ward v. Audland, not merely dissented from that proposition, but distinctly expressed his opinion that it was not law. That was so clearly, also, the opinion of so eminent a judge as Maule, J., in the case of Lunn v. Thornton (1 C. B. 379), that I think I may take it now that the true view of the law is this.—The question to be determined is not whether there has been an actual handing over of property manually, but whether, looking at all the surrounding circumstances of the case, and looking particularly at the nature and character of the chattel which is proposed to be given, there has or has not been a clear intention expressed on the part of the donor to give, and a clear intention on the part of the recipient to receive and act upon such a gift. Whenever such a case should arise again, I am confident that that would be the basis of the decision of a Court of Common Law; and, of course, the same result would follow in a Court of Equity.—p. 580.

there was an appeal, but the appellant confined his appeal to that part of the order which restrained him from dealing with the customers of the old firm. The C. A. dissolved that part of the injunction of which the appellant complained. . . . The case is chiefly important for present purposes in so far as it discloses the view taken by the learned judges who on that occasion constituted the C. A. on the point now under consideration. In Barrett v. Pearson, to which I shall have occasion to refer immediately, Cotton, L.J. stated that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson was doubted in Leggatt v. Barrett by James, L.J. and himself. This is no doubt correct so far as Cotton, L.J. is concerned, but I am unable to find any very clear indication that this was the view of James, L.J. . . . The impression produced upon my mind by the whole of the judgment is that the learned judge had not arrived at the conclusion that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrong. Brist, L.J. expressed a decided approval of that decision. . . . The next case in which the matter was brought under consideration of the C. A. was that of Walker v. Mottram. . . . Of the L.J. who then constituted the Court, Baggallay, L.J. expressed a strong doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson. He said that it appeared to him, as at present advised, that it went far beyond what any of the previous decisions would have sanctioned. Lush and Lindley, L.J.J., the other members of the Court, said that the rule laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson had, it was believed, been recognised and acted upon in practice, and, whatever else might be said of it, the rule was in accordance with the general opinion of what was fair and right, and was easily applied in practice. In Pedison v. Pearson the question came again before the C. A. The facts were there less favourable to the plaintiff than in Labouchere v. Dawson, and Baggallay and Lindley, L.J.J. both considered that, even if Labouchere v. Dawson was rightly decided, the case then before them was not governed by it. Baggallay and Cotton, L.J., however, distinctly rested their judgments on the ground that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson was wrong, and ought to be overruled. Lindley, L.J., on the other hand, was of opinion that it was rightly decided. The reason of Baggallay, L.J., for dissenting from Labouchere v. Dawson, so far as it is disclosed by the report of his judgment, appears to be that it went beyond a number of decisions of a higher Court, and, as he thought, without sufficient reason. Even assuming that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson went beyond previous decisions, this does not seem to me to afford any indication that it was wrong, unless it can be shown that it was in conflict with the principles involved in those earlier decisions. Cotton, L.J., examined the earlier decisions, and arrived at the conclusion that Lord Eldon was against the notion that the vendor of the goodwill of a business was, in the absence of express contract, to be restrained from carrying on a similar business in the way in which he might lawfully carry it on if there had been no sale of the goodwill. The learned L.J. pointed out that Lord Romilly rested his decision in Labouchere v. Dawson on the principle that a man could not derogate from his grant. "But," he said, "it is admitted that a person who has sold the goodwill of his business may set up a similar business next door, and say that he is the person who carried on the old business; yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customer from going to the old place. I cannot see where to draw the line. If he may, by his acts, invite the old customers to deal with him and not with the purchaser, why may he not apply to them and ask them to do so? I think it would be wrong to put such a meaning on 'goodwill' as would give a right to such an injunction as has been granted in the present case." I propose now to examine the other authorities. I may state at once, however, that I can find nothing in them inconsistent with the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson. It no doubt went beyond them, inasmuch as it dealt with a question not determined by them, but this seems to me to be no demerit, nor to afford any indication that it was wrong. The earliest case which has any bearing upon the point is that of Crutwell v. Lyc, before Lord Eldon. . . . The importance of the case consists in the definition which Lord Eldon gave of the goodwill there sold. He said, "The goodwill which has been the subject of the sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Fraud would form a different consideration; but if that effect was prevented by no other means than those which belong to the fair course of improving a trade in which it was lawful to engage, I should, in imposing it, carry the effect of my injunction to a much greater length than any decision has authorised, or imagination even suggested." These observations were much relied on by Cotton, L.J., in Pearson v. Pearson. If the language of Lord Eldon is to be taken as an exhaustive definition of general application, I think it is far too narrow, and I am not satisfied that it was intended by Lord Eldon as an exhaustive definition. "Goodwill," I apprehend," said Wood, V.-C. in Churton v. Douglas, "must mean every advantage, every possible advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the late partner not carrying on the business himself, that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business." The learned V.-C. pointed out in this connection that it would be absurd to say that when a large wholesale business is conducted, the public are mindful whether it is carried on in Fleet Street or the Strand. The question what is meant by "goodwill" is, no doubt, a critical one. Sir George Jessel, discussing in Ginesi v. Cooper the language of Wood, V.-C. which I have just quoted, said, "Attracting customers to the business is a matter connected with the carrying on of it. It is the formation of that connection which has made the value of the thing that the late firm sold, and they really had nothing else to sell in the shape of goodwill." He pointed out that, in the case before him, the connection had been formed by years of work. The members of the firm knew where to sell the stone; and he asks, "Is it to be supposed that they did not sell that personal connection when they sold the trade or business and the goodwill thereof?" The present M.R. took much the same view as to what constitutes the goodwill of a business. I cannot myself doubt that they were right. It is the connection thus formed, together with the circumstances, whether of habit or otherwise, which tend to make it permanent, that constitutes the goodwill of a business. It is this which constitutes the difference between a business just started, which has no goodwill attached to it, and one which has acquired a goodwill. The former trader has to seek out his customers. The latter has a custom ready made. He knows what members of the community are purchasers of the articles in which he deals, and are not attached by custom to any other establishment. What obligations, then, does the sale of the goodwill of a business impose upon the vendor? I do not think they would necessarily be the same under all circumstances. I think it must be treated as settled that whenever the goodwill of a business is sold the vendor does not by reason only of that sale, come under a restriction not to carry on a competing business. This is really the strong point in the position of those who maintain that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrongly decided. Cotton, L.J. says [see quotation, supra, col. 1189]. I quite feel the force of this argument, but it does not strike me as conclusive. It is often impossible to draw the line and yet to be perfectly certain that particular acts are on one side of it or the other. It does not seem to me to follow that because a man may, by his acts, invite all men to deal with him, and so, amongst the rest of mankind, invite the former customers of the firm, he may use the knowledge which he has acquired of what persons were customers of the old firm, in order, by an appeal to them, to seek to weaken their habit of dealing where they have dealt before, or whatever else binds them to the old business, and so to secure their custom for himself. This seems to me to be a direct and intentional dealing with the goodwill and an endeavour to destroy it. If a person who has previously been partner in a firm sets up in business on his own account and appeals generally for custom, he only does that which any member of the public may do, and which those carrying on the same trade are doing already. It is true that those who were former customers of the firm to which he belonged, may, of their own accord turn for their custom to him, but this incidental advantage is unavoidable, and does not result from any act of his. He only conducts his business in precisely the same way as he would if he had never been a member of the firm to which he previously belonged. But when he specifically and directly appeals to those who were customers of the previous firm, he seeks to take advantage of the connection previously formed by his old firm, and of the knowledge of that connection which he has previously acquired to take that which constitutes the goodwill away from the persons to whom it has been sold, and to restore it to himself. It is said, indeed, that he may not represent himself as a successor of the old firm, or as carrying on a continuation of their business; but this, in many cases, appears to me of little importance, and of small practical advantage, if canvassing the customers of the old firm were allowed without restraint. I do not think that in cases where an injunction was granted in terms employed in Labouchere v. Dawson there would be any real difficulty in drawing the line and determining whether there had been a breach of it or not.—pp. 3—8.

STIRLING, J.—In point of decision neither of these cases governs that before me [viz., the case of a sale by one of two partners of all his interest in the assets to the other, goodwill not being expressly mentioned]. Gray v. Smith (post, col. 2051), does not, for it related to the use of a trade name and not to the canvassing of customers. It is, however, an authority in favour of the defendant to this extent, that it decides that a contract for the sale of assets generally does not always confer on a purchaser the same rights as one in which goodwill is specifically mentioned. Another again does Pearson v. Pearson, for all the learned judges relied on the terms of the clause, no equivalent to which is found in the agreement with which I have to deal. It appears, however, to be an authority in favour of the plaintiff in so far as it contains expressions of opinion by the majority of the Court, that under a clause not substantially differing from the agreement before me the defendant was not entitled to canvass customers, while the third (Cotton, L.J.) apparently was not of this opinion—p. 195.

Jennings*], I desire to add a few observations on the point mentioned by Stirling, J. which occasioned him some doubt. In cases of sale of a business by the Court for the purpose of winding-up a partnership, it has been the practice to provide by the particulars of sale that the sale would not prevent the persons previously interested in the business, or their representatives, from carrying on a like business. But that provision is invited whether the dissolution of partnership occurs by death of a partner or in the lifetime of all the partners. The reason of its insertion is to prevent a purchaser being misled into supposing that he is buying, or that the vendors are going to sell to him, anything beyond what would be implied by the law by an assignment of the goodwill of the business. *See the observations of Turner and Knight Bruce, L.J., in Johnson v. Hilleley [31 L. J. Ch. 179]. The provision is not intended to give any right to the partners or their representatives as to appropriate to themselves the benefit of the goodwill which has to be sold. It merely points out, so as to prevent any mistake or misunderstanding, that the sale of goodwill of a business does not itself prevent vendors from carrying on a like business; but the provision does not provide, and is not intended to provide, that the like business may be carried on by the vendors in a manner incompatible with their position as vendors (p. 187). With regard to Pearson v. Pearson, also referred to by Stirling, J. in Jennings v. Jennings. I think it is clear that the parties must have intended that the defendant should be authorised to carry on business in the same way as any stranger might do; and certainly that was the view which was taken by the O.A., and upon which its decision was based—p. 188.

OSGERS-HARDY, J.—It has been argued with great force by the defendant's counsel that in Pearson v. Pearson there were two points decided, and that the present case comes within the second point which was not dealt with or overruled in the House of Lords [in Trego v. Hunt]. The point is this: It is argued that there is an express proviso here that the sale of the goodwill is not to prevent either partner from starting a similar business in the neighbourhood after the expiration of the partnership. The first observation which arises is that, if that last proviso were omitted, would there have been anything to prevent either partner from starting a similar business at the expiration of the partnership? Certainly not Trego v. Hunt, which decided that you could not solicit the customers, also decided that it was too late to hold that the vendor of the goodwill could not carry on the same business in the same neighbourhood. I think, therefore, that the proviso really does not do anything more than express that which would have been implied if it had not been expressed. Then it is argued that that is inconsistent with Pearson v. Pearson. . . . On the construction of those two clauses [of the agreement in that case] all three

A cab does not become any other than a hackney carriage though plying for hire in a railway station. I do not wish to throw any doubt upon the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; but, if the matter were new it might be worth while to consider whether a hackney carriage might not be a stage carriage if passengers were carried at separate fares, and so brought by implication within the either part of sect. 4 of the Act.—

CAMPBELL, L.C.—In the celebrated case of Reg. v. Millis, which was an appeal from a judgment holding that by the common law of England a valid marriage could not be contracted without the presence of a priest canonically ordained, the question having been put that the judgment be reversed there was an equality of votes of the judges who were present and took part in the decision. Thereupon the House affirmed the judgment, deciding that by the common law of England a valid marriage could not be contracted without the presence of a priest canonically ordained. I by no means concurred in that decision, thinking that the common law of England accorded with the canon law upon this subject which prevailed over the whole of the Western Church till the Council of Trent, and that a valid marriage might be contracted by the sole assent of the contracting parties, as Lord Stowell had often laid down, and for fifty years had been considered clear law in Westminster Hall. But subsequently, when presiding as C.J. of the Court of Q. B., I several times, with the approbation of my brother judges, ruled that the question as to the validity of such marriages was settled by the decision of the H. L. in Reg. v. Millis, and if this question were again to be mooted in this House upon an appeal I conceive that this House would be bound to decide that such a marriage was always null and void, although every peer present should be of opinion that Reg. v. Millis was improperly decided, and that in England, till Lord Hale's Act, the presence of a priest was as little necessary for making a binding marriage contract, as a binding contract of hiring and service.—p. 531

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Whether a marriage actually took place during the lifetime of C. L., or the cohabitation of the parties was merely an adulterous intercourse without any marriage ceremony, the appellant contends that, beginning in an illicit connection, the presumption of subsequent marriage from the continuance of it altogether ceases, and that nothing short of proof of actual marriage, or of such a total change in the character of the cohabitation as will amount to habit and repute of a marriage, will be sufficient to establish the respondent's title. . . . A great number of cases were cited in support of this proposition of the appellant, but those mainly relied upon were Cunningham v. Cunningham and Lapsley v. Grierson. . . . Upon the facts of the case [Cunningham v. Cunningham] Lord Eldon's remarks are pointed and pertinent, but were clearly not intended for general application. His lordship said: "When the cohabitation of a man and woman was not known to have been in its origin illicit, presumption was that it was lawful. But where it was HANNEN, v. C.—I there held that a colonial law prohibiting the marriage of the guilty party so long as the other remained unmarried did not operate as a bar to re-marriage where the guilty party had acquired a domicile in this country. The distinction between that case and the present is, that there the incapacity to re-marry imposed by the colonial law only attached to the guilty party. It was, therefore, penal in its character, and, as such, was inoperative out of the jurisdiction under which it was initiated. A case to a similar effect, and based on the same principle, was cited from an American report—Poussard v. Johnson, 2 Blackford 81.—p. 90.

Murray v. Milner (1879) 12 Ch. D. 845; 48 L. J. Ch. 775, 41 L. T. 218, 37 W. R. 881. SVY. J.—It has been argued that the will is not capable of being looked at as a declaration by the deceased father of the claimant, because it is said you must either admit the marriage before you can show that there is any relationship between the declarant and the claimant, or you must deny the existence of the relationship, and then it would be the declaration of a mere stranger. In my judgment that argument cannot prevail. It would lead to great difficulty. As long ago as Goodright v. Moss, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1777, it was determined that general declarations are good evidence after the death of a parent to prove that a child was born before marriage. In that case the Court of Q. B. applied the rule, and Lord Mansfield pointed out that declarations of parents in their lifetime were admissible, and said, "I have known advice given to a father and mother to make attested declarations in writing, under their hand, of the precise time of the birth of the bastard child, and the subsequent marriage, to prevent controversy in the family touching the inheritance. If the credit of such declarations is impeached it must be left to the jury to judge of," clearly holding that such declarations are admissible.—p. 849.

HALL, V.-C.—I am of opinion that I cannot treat the decision in Rideout's Trusts, In re, as beating the construction which Mr Pearson has contended for. A very important question is raised here, and looking at that case—the arguments, dates, and the affidavits which were read—the learned judge did not, as I conceive he would have done in express terms if the old rule had prevailed, exclude those affidavits, but his judgment was clearly to the effect that the law did not exclude a great portion of the evidence of the husband, and, therefore, though I cannot say that the decision in that case altered the law in that respect, yet the learned judge seems to have considered that the law may have been altered. though, having regard to the old rule, he did not act upon the alteration further than this—that he treated the evidence as admissible, but not to be acted upon unless corroborated by other evidence.—p. 547.

MARTIN, B.—As to Laurence v. Ticeanton, except it be explicable in the manner suggested by Lord Campbell, in his judgment in this case, namely, that time was not of the essence of the contract, or that the law relating to holding intercourse with persons affected by the plague (see 1 Jac. 1. c. 41) made the performance of the contract illegal, I cannot agree with it. It is, no doubt, referred to in several books of authority, but, unless explained as above, it seems contrary to the rule of law [that when a person by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his conduct].—p. 60.

COLLINS, L.J. (for self, ALVERSTONE, M.R. and RIGBY, J.J.)—Peers weigh, no doubt, plaintiffs' suits for jactitation as often as other persons' yet, if the right have claimed existed, they had a much simpler remedy. Indeed Hawke (Lord) v. Corri is a good illustration of this. There, in a suit brought by Lord Hawke for jactitation of marriage, the opponent called himself Lady Hawke, she set up a case of marriage which she, however, abandoned, and rested her defence on the fact that Lord Hawke had at one time consented to her bearing the title. This was held by Sir W. Scott to negative malice on her part, and the suit failed. The experienced counsel, arguing for Lord Hawke before Sir W. Scott, are reported to have said, in excusing their client for proceeding after his former conduct to the lady (p. 284). "A suit of jactitation was the only remedy by which the party could protect himself, and his family, from such an assumption of a false relation to himself and to them." This is more than negative evidence.—p. 124.

LORD LINDLEY.—In 1897 the Countess Cowley obtained a divorce from her husband; but, although the divorce dissolved her marriage, it did not determine her life estate in the peerage which she had already acquired. There is no principle of common law, nor is there anything in the Divorce Act, which produces any such result. Fendall v. Goldsmid goes far to show that so far as name is concerned the countess was entitled to continue after the divorce to use the name and style which she had previously acquired the right to use. Speaking generally, the law of this country allows any person to assume and use the name, provided its use is not calculated to deceive and to inflict pecuniary loss. The law on this subject will be found examined in a very instructive note from the pen of the late Mr. Walcy in 3 Dav. Conv. part I (2nd ed.), p. 283. The judgments of Tindal, C.J. in Davies v. Lowndes and of the P. C. delivered by Sir H. Phillimore in Du Boulay v. Du Boulay leave no doubt about it. Sir H. Phillimore, in Du Boulay v. Du Boulay, stated that, "In this country we do not recognise the absolute right of a person to a particular name to the extent of entitling him to prevent the assumption of that name by a stranger." Then, after alluding to trade names, the judgment continues: "The mere assumption of a name, which is the patronymic of a family, by a stranger who had never before been called by that name, whatever cause of annoyance it may be to a family, is a grievance for which our law affords no redress"—p. 88.

JESSEL, M.R.—I now come to consider the only case that was cited by Mrs. Besant. That is Brown v. Brown. That case was very different as regards dates from this. Now, I must say that this case was decided before the learned judge had decided Marshall v. Marshall. He does not seem to have taken into consideration the fact that the wife had a complete answer to a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights—it had not then been decided that she had, and perhaps that is the reason he did not consider it. But he seems to have considered that the husband had so misconducted himself that he was not entitled to rely upon the agreement for separation, and that, therefore, the wife was also entitled to repudiate it. But with the greatest respect for the learned judge, the repudiation of the deed of separation means, I suppose, the right to return to cohabitation, and if so—if that must be the voluntary act of the wife—it does not appear to me possible that she can say that she is in dread, or that there is any danger. He seems to have omitted from his consideration the foundation of the law, which was the apprehension of danger on the part of the wife, as in Marshall v. Marshall she could not be in any danger at all.—p. 616. And see post, col. 1207.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Hunt v. Hunt is the only case in which an injunction has been granted at the suit of a wife to restrain a husband from carrying on his suit for restitution of conjugal rights, the husband having covenanted not to endeavour to compel the wife to cohabit with him by any legal proceedings. An appeal to this House from that decision was fully argued; and everything which fell from the law lords (except Lord Westbury), in an unusually strong House, was favourable to the appellant; and I myself know, from having argued the case. But Lord Westbury persuaded the House to put some question to the judges, and meanwhile the husband died, so that the case came to an end. Sir G. Jessel seems to have followed that authority in Besant v. Wood (p. 421). Bateman v. Ross (Convent) (post, col. 1240), Wilson v. Wilson (supra), Vanitser v. I. vanitser (post, col. 1242), and Besant v. Wood, were all cases of agreements for separation, all, except the last, founded on compromise of suits, and the last was treated by the late M.R. as virtually for the prevention of a suit, which, whether rightly or not, he regarded as the same thing. The late M.R. cannot have intended by the language which he used in Besant v. Wood to affirm the doctrine that the wife was to be regarded as a feme sole in such an absolute sense as to give her an unqualified power to contract with her husband, on the occasion of such a compromise, concerning her real or personal estate, in a manner in which she could not contract for any consideration with any other person.—pp. 430, 431.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question came again before Sir G. Jessel in Besant v. Wood. I think that his reasoning cannot be shaken, that where a wife has power to sue her husband she must have power to compromise any such proceeding, or to bind herself to abstain from taking it. There is nothing in Cahill v. Cahill (supra) to destroy the authority of Besant v. Wood. So far as the decision in that case goes, there is only a warning against carrying the principle further. Until the H. L. declares the law to be otherwise, we must proceed on the view that a contract by a married woman not to sue for restitution of conjugal rights can be enforced against her.—p. 196. FRY, L.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think that this case is not governed by Field v Field to the extent to which the learned judge held it to be. That case differs from the present in more respects than one. In the first place the letter there was nothing more than a lawyer's letter. In the next place the present appellant expressed what we were unable to find in the letter in Field v Field—her desire to return to cohabit with her husband. Thirdly, it appears in the present case that the husband received the letter and answered it immediately with an unqualified refusal to take his wife back; whereas in Field v Field, there was no proof that he had ever received the letter—p. 49.

- LORD PENZANCE.—The question then is, whether a woman who voluntarily enters into an agreement that her husband shall live apart from her, can be said to have been deserted without just cause. I repeat the opinion I formed in Crabb v. Crabb, that she cannot. There is a material difference between such a case as this and Nott v. Nott. The ratio decidendi in Nott v. Nott was, that the wife never agreed to live separate from the husband. The making of a deed was contemplated, and some of the parties executed it, but the party whose execution was to make it an efficient and binding agreement was the trustee who covenanted for the wife, and he never signed it, so that the deed was never completed. In this case the Court is jointly obliged to hold that the wife has bargained away her right to relief on the ground of desertion, and that the charge of desertion without cause for two years is not established.—P. 27

- Huxtable v. Huxtable (1899) 68 L. J. P. 83.—JEUNE, P.—It is not an uncommon thing to find that Reg. v. Leresche has not been properly understood. The circumstances of life, such as business duties, domestic service, and other things, may separate husband and wife, and yet, notwithstanding, there may be cohabitation. In giving judgment in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald Lord Penzance said, "I come, then, to the following conclusions as applicable to cases of this kind: No one can 'desert' who does not actively and wilfully bring to an end an existing state of cohabitation. Cohabitation may be put an end to by other acts besides that of actually quitting the common home. Advantage may be taken of temporary absence or separation to hold aloof from a renewal of intercourse. This done wilfully, against the wish of the other party, and in execution of a design to cease cohabitation, would constitute 'desertion'." This is a true statement of the law, but it must not be taken to mean that cohabitation necessarily implies the daily and nightly residence together of the husband and wife. This was pointed out by this Court as recently as the year 1897 in Bradshaw v. Bradshaw—p. 85. BARNES, J. concurred.

t v. Durant, Sir

as unnecessary to decide upon the point, as no was satisfied that adultery subsequent to the established condonation was proved, expresses an opinion which is, no doubt, a weighty authority, though not a decision. He went very far in his language. He says (p. 761), "If nothing but clear proof . . . cruelly will revive adultery." If this language is to be taken without qualification, and followed to its logical result, it would follow that, however long a spouse had, after condoned adultery, lived chastely and in full performance of all that a spouse should do, any lapse, however slight and venial in itself, from duty, revived the old adultery, and obliged, or at least enabled, the Court to decree a separation. This does not seem to me either just or expedient, I doubt if it was meant. No case in the Ecclesiastical Courts was cited in which the ground of complaint was not one which was, from its nature, capable of being aggravated by the previous, though condoned, adultery, and in most, if not all, it was so grave that it might well be a ground for separation, even if not so aggravated, and in Dent v. Dent, to be noticed later, it was such cruelty as, without adultery, would have entitled the petitioner to a divorce à mensâ et thoro (p. 237). . . In Dent v. Dent the wife petitioned on account of adultery and cruelty. The husband pleaded condonation of the cruelty. On the point it was admitted that he had been condoned.

present case is so clearly distinguishable from Pizzala v Pizzala. There the husband was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman, but not in the matrimonial home, and refused to break it off, although his wife told him that unless he did so she must leave him. The wife then left him, and he continued to live with the woman for over two years. The President held the husband guilty of desertion. These cases all appear to me to have been decided in accordance with the principles shortly stated above, and no distinction has been made whether the adulterous intercourse was carried on in the matrimonial home or elsewhere—p. 115.

taken place in 1861, there is evidence that in 1864 the husband was guilty of cruelty. If you are satisfied of that fact, you will find that though the wife did pardon the husband's adultery there was subsequently committed which revived that adultery. The cruelty must have been within the 27th section, 'such cruelty as, without adultery, would have entitled her to a divorce à mens et thoro.' This is, I think, the only case reported in which the doctrine of revival has been made the ground on which a divorce à mens et thoro has been granted, and the strong objection arising from its varying the status of married persons does not seem to have been brought to the notice of the learned judge. In Blanford v. Blanford, there had been adultery and desertion: there had been a forgiveness of both that adultery and of the desertion, and a resumption of conjugal intercourse for a few months; after which the adultery with the same person was resumed; there was no condonation of that latter adultery, and the question was whether it could be coupled with the previous desertion, though that desertion had ceased before the adultery complained of was committed. This seems to me a very different question from that raised in Dent v. Dent. But it is to be observed that the judge ordinary, Sir J. Hannen, seems to express approbation of the doctrine laid down in the dictum in Durant v. Durant—p 240.

words were uttered by that learned judge, because they are wholly inconsistent with the tenor of the rest of his judgment, but as they are attributed to him in this report I think it right to say, that so far as my judgment extends, that is not the law, and that it would be a disgrace to the law if it were so. If a husband knowing the tendency and the evil habit of the wife—misled by the expression—"let the licentiousness of the wife take its full scope"—without reproof or interference, I hold that he would never obtain any remedy in a Court of Justice. was relied on; but that is not a very satisfactory authority on which to decide an important question of law, because it is the report of a summing-up to a jury, in which the learned judge would be more diffuse than in giving judgment, and might very possibly use expressions which did not convey his precise meaning.

Besides, the question in that case was whether there had been collusion between the petitioner and the co-respondent and other persons. The allegation in the answer was that "the petitioner, in collusion with the co-respondent and with divers other persons, in or about the month of October, 1860, procured the defilement of the respondent by the co-respondent, which is the adultery (if any) alleged in his petition", and it was in reference to that allegation that the learned judge made the following observations

upon which the petitioners relies:—"On the part of the respondent . . . that would not affect the petitioner's case." If by these observations the learned judge merely intended to convey that it was not a necessary result of the evidence that the petitioner was acting in collusion with the co-respondent, that may be so; but I desire to state distinctly and broadly, in order that, if I am wrong, I may be corrected by a Court of liberty to let the licentiousness of the wife take its full scope." I cannot believe that these LINDLEY, L.J. (after having discussed the cases at law and in equity as to the custody of infants) continued: "It was there [Ryder v. Ryder] decided that the Court had no jurisdiction to make any order as to the custody of children over sixteen. The main ground for this decision appears to have been that Courts of Common Law did not make orders disposing of the custody of children over sixteen, and the Divorce Court had not the children before it, and could not therefore enforce against them any order it might make. This reason does not appear to me satisfactory. The Divorce Court could decide as between the parents which parent should have the custody of the children. And even if the Divorce Court could not bring the children before it and exercise jurisdiction over them, still, if the Divorce Court had made an order binding on the parents, such an order might, if necessary and proper, have been enforced by proceedings in Chancery. The effect of Ryder v. Ryder practically was to enable a delinquent father to set up the age of his infant child as an answer to an application for an order for its custody. This was, in my opinion, an unfortunate decision, but it is one from which the Judicature Acts have, in my opinion, set us free. It was also wrong to hold as a matter of law that maintenance followed custody and that the Court had no jurisdiction to order maintenance for a child over sixteen. This was decided in Webster v. Webster, although WILLIAMS, J., in Ryder v. Ryder, had pointed out that it did not follow from that decision that maintenance could not be ordered for a child over sixteen. Even before the Judicature Act, 1873, the cases, in my judgment, went too far. But after that Act I confess my inability to understand how it can be right to hold that the statutory discretion conferred upon the Court is restricted within the narrow limits previously supposed. And, in Benyon v. Benyon an allowance was made for a child until twenty-four. However, in Blanford v. Blanford the late President (Sir C. Butt) distinctly held that the Court had no power to make an order as to the custody or maintenance or education of a child who was over sixteen years of age. The attention of the President does not, however, appear to have been called either to the Judicature Act, 1873, or to Agar-Ellis, In re (1883) 53 L. J. Ch. 10; 24 Ch. D. 317.—C.A. See "INFANTS," post, col. 1220) and his decision, in my judgment, was erroneous. In the present case the learned President has simply followed Blanford v. Blanford, which he considered to be binding on him.—p. 142.

COTTON, L.J.—It was contended that in Miller v. Miller the order of sequestration was only against the separate estate of a married woman as to which there was no restraint against antipaction, but we find from the minutes of the order (which have been obtained by the registrar) that that is not so, but that the order and writ were in the same general form as in the present case, and we are told that the practitioner in the Divorce Court has always been to make the order and issue the writ in that form.—p. 172.

FRY, L.J.—Then it was argued that the sequestration order ought to be confined in the same manner as the judgment in Scott v. Morley (1887) 57 L. J. Q. B. 43, 20 Q. B. D. 120, post, col. 1287. Now, in the first place, I may observe that Scott v. Morley has really nothing to do with a case of sequestration. This was a case of a judgment for damages, which can be obtained against a married woman only under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act of 1882. . . . But with regard to sequestration, it appears to me that that statute does nothing at all—p. 177.

FRY, L. J.—It is to be borne in mind that not a single case can be found in which a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro has been pronounced in favour of a wife who has been guilty of adultery. Lord Stowell, no doubt, in Chambers v. Chambers (supra) expressed a doubt as to whether a decree might not be pronounced where the husband was guilty of cruelty; but Dr. Lushington in Dillon v. Dillon (supra) expressly dissented from that intimation of opinion on Lord Stowell's part. Since the passing of the Act of 1857 the point has been fully discussed and considered in Drummond v. Drummond, in which the judge ordinary arrived at the conclusion that the adultery of the wife was a bar to any relief.—p. 151

JEUNE, M.R.—There was, first, Jessop v. Blake, very soon after the passing of the Divorce Act. [His lordship, having stated the facts of the case, continued.] The judgment was . . . not that the settlement was destroyed, but apparently (for I can only guess) the V.-C. adopted the plaintiff's counsel's argument that it ceased because the dissolution of the marriage was equivalent to the death of the husband. If that were so, it is difficult to see how all the preceding law on the subject could have been right; and it is impossible to see that there is any change in the declaration of trust or the position of the parties, which authorised it. All I can say is that, considering the vast current of authority which existed previously as regards marriages dissolved, I am quite unable to follow these cases which were decided upon the ground that the dissolution of the marriage was equivalent to the death of the husband. The next case is . . .

Swift v. Wenman. . . The judgment . . . is thus reported in the Law Reports: "Lord Romilly, M.R., considered that the husband had no interest in the trust fund, and made a decree according to the prayer of the bill." I am utterly at a loss to know why. It is a decision without a reason, and it cannot furnish a guiding principle for deciding anything. Whether or not it might be binding in the identical case I am not sure, but my present impression is, that I should not consider it as binding, even in the identical case, under the circumstances. The next is . . . Bussell v. Darding. . . The judgment was in these words: "I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the whole property." Why? I cannot find out at all, but there it is. That is the third decision. I am unable to follow it. . . I am quite unable to say how he [Lord Romilly] distinguished Bussell v. Darding from Evans v. Carrington—pp 25—27.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—Farrington v. Farrington, A. v. M. (supra, col. 1221) (a nullity case), and Meredith v. Meredith are all cases to show that the Court has exercised the power under sect 5 of the [Matrimonial Causes] Act of 1859 in cases where there never had been issue of the marriage. In these cases the Court does not seem to have been much, if at all, discussed, but in Wigney v. Wigney (supra, col. 1223), the question was directly raised and argued, and, according to Sir G. Jessel, the amendment contained in the latter section was not expressed in the most artistic way, because, where there were no children of the marriage there could be no person to whom the former section could in terms apply, but what was meant, of course, was that, where there were no children, the persons to be benefited were the divorced husband and wife. This seems a direct decision of the C.A. on the point, it was followed by the C.A. in Ponsonby v. Ponsonby (supra, col. 1222). . . . Now it is said that the jointure rechargé and term could only come into force if the marriage should take effect, and that as the marriage has been declared void it did not take effect, and the jointure rechargé and term cannot come into force, and the settlement was without consideration. Barnes, J. says that Chapman v. Bradley (supra, col. 1221) and Chapman v. Brown (supra, col. 1222) support these reasons. I agree with Barnes, J. as to the effect of these cases, except that, as a deal does not require consideration, I should rather have said the condition had not happened on which the deal was to take effect than that the deal was without consideration. But I do not agree with Barnes, J. as to the result, for, as I have already said, inasmuch as all marriage settlements are subject to the condition marriage, if one were to hold that the Court cannot under sect 5 apply settled property for the benefit of the wife and children unless there has been a valid marriage, it would be to hold that the powers of sect. 5 can never be exercised in the case of a decree of nullity, but the section says that the powers may be exercised in such a case. This, in my opinion, by necessary implication gives the Court the power to vary the settlement to this extent.—p. 150 HALSBURY, L.C. and A. L. SMITH, L.J. concur.

Walpole v. Walpole and Goddard (No. 2) (1901) 70 L. J. P. 49, [1901] P. 196; 84 L. T. 727.

JUNE, P.—I am afraid I can hardly deal with this case in the same way as in Meredith v. Meredith. The two cases are distinguishable, because here, if the respondent's life interest is extinguished, as admittedly it should be, the petitioner does not himself acquire an absolute interest, and has not power to dispose of this property. His next-of-kin still would have an interest in the property under the Statute of Distributions, and if I were to destroy their interest, I should be extinguishing the interests of persons entitled to property and whose conduct is in no way impugned. In Meredith v. Meredith I thought that, although Noel v. Noel (supra, col. 1223) showed that the Court will not disturb settlements further than the alteration of circumstances warrants, and will respect the interests of persons whose conduct has not been impugned, still I considered myself justified in going the length of giving the property wholly and absolutely to the petitioner. So in Wyman v. Wyman the wife obtained the whole property. It was only in the event of the wife not disposing of the property that the interests of the next-of-kin would have come into operation in that case—p. 51.

Waite v. Morland (1888) 38 Ch. D. 135, 57 L. J. Ch. 655, 53 L. T. 185, 36 W. R. 484.—C. A. CORTON, J.—In Isaacs, In re (supra, col. 1221), the property was a reversionary interest on wife which came into possession after the decree for judicial separation, and there it was properly held that she took it as a feme sola. That case has, therefore, no application to the present. Then in Howard and Adams Purchase, In re (supra, col. 1221), there was a legacy to the wife which became payable before the protection order, but it was not reduced into possession by the husband, and after the protection order the person liable to pay it paid it to the wife; and the M.R. held he was justified in so doing. That is intelligible, but it does not govern the present case. . . . It is not necessary for us to express any opinion upon that decision [Dawes v. Creyke], but there, in fact, the property did come to the wife after the decree, and it does not govern this case. We are not bound by that decision [Cooke v. Fuller], and if it has the effect contended for by the appellants I should decline to follow it. No doubt it was very similar to this case. A wife was deserted by her husband, and afterwards her father bequeathed a fund to her for her separate use without power of anticipation, and she subsequently obtained a protection order. Lord Romilly held that she was entitled to payment of the fund free from the restraint on anticipation. There may have been circumstances that justified the decision, but the case is very shortly reported, and the reasons for the decision are not stated—p. 137.
LINDLEY, J.—That case [Cooke v. Fuller] was not decided under sect. 25 [Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857], but under sect. 21, which has reference to a protection order, and is expressed in different terms—p. 138. BOWEN, L.J. concurred. And see post.

KECKWICH, J.—*Hill v. We never intended to say that after a conviction of an aggravated assault there could be a subsequent application for an order for cohabitation, or for the custody of children, or for maintenance—p. 661. BARNES, J. concurred.

CORTOX, L. J.—The question we have to deal with is whether during the period between the decree nisi and the final decree alimony can be granted. Until the final decree the Court can make no permanent provision for the wife, therefore it seems reasonable that it should have power to make some temporary provision. For this reason, independently of authority, I should come to the conclusion that the order appealed from was right. Latham v Latham is no doubt an authority against it, but that is not binding upon us. If it had been generally followed it might not have been right to disturb the practice. But it is not so. In Laxton v Laxton, the same judge who decided Latham v Latham seems to have doubted its correctness, and said that it ought to be considered again. Laxton v Laxton is an authority for the view that an application for permanent alimony before the final decree is premature. Therefore, I think, we are justified in overruling Latham v Latham—p. 189

CORTOX, L. J.—The question is whether Wells v Wells lays down a binding rule that after the verdict of a jury has established the adultery of a wife, she can as a matter of right claim that alimony pendente lite which has been allowed her shall go on till the period during which a new trial can be applied for has expired. In Wells v Wells, there was no motion for a new trial, in the present case a motion for a new trial has been refused. We do not find on inquiry that Wells v Wells has been treated in the Divorce Court as establishing such a general rule as is contended for—that, although the wife has been found guilty, the alimony must go on till the case is finally disposed of. Ellis v Ellis was an entirely different case. The wife there took the proceedings against her husband, and she had in no way forfeited her rights against him. The case was one where it would be proper ultimately to grant permanent alimony, and we thought it reasonable that in the meantime she should have intermediate alimony—p. 92 LINDLEY and BOWEN, L. J. concurred

HALESHELL, L. C.—Under the circumstances of that case [Blackmore v. Mills] it may have been quite right to refuse to grant alimony. But I do not think Lord Penzance meant to lay down that the Court had no jurisdiction to grant alimony in a suit for nullity on the ground that the marriage was void ab initio, if he did, I cannot agree with him. In Bird v Bird, in 1753, Sir G. Lee, the then judge of the Court of Aches, in a suit for nullity of marriage, brought by the husband on the ground that at the time of the marriage the wife had another husband living, a de facto marriage being admitted, held that the husband must bear the expenses of the wife. Sir G. Lee said that, as there was no precedent, he must determine the case upon the general principles of law and reason. And he added, "I must presume, until the contrary appeared in evidence, that she was his wife de jure, as well as de facto, for otherwise she must be guilty of bigamy, and is a felon by stat. of Jac. 1; but the law presumes, on the contrary, everybody to be innocent till they are found guilty." That was, no doubt, the first decision of the kind. But it appears to have become afterwards the settled practice of the ecclesiastical courts to grant alimony to a wife pending suit in all cases of this kind, unless there was some special reason to the contrary.

In my opinion, the practice is in accordance with reason and good sense—p. 312

JEUNE, P.—It was argued before me that the husband's income of £60 a month is a voluntary allowance from his brother, and that, therefore, it ought not to be taken into account in fixing alimony, and reliance was placed on Haviland v Haviland, I therefore reserved judgment, because I wished to ascertain by an examination of the authorities and by inquiry whether it has been since the date of that case the practice in the Registry to exclude from their calculations all incomes to which the recipients have no legal claim. I am informed that it has not, but, on the contrary, in many cases such incomes have been taken into calculation. Not only do I think it right that this should be so, but I can easily understand why Haviland v Haviland has not been considered to forbid such a practice.—p. 86.

LORD PENZANCE—Upon the question of the validity of the rules made by the judge ordinary alone, I adhere to what I said in Charles v. Charles. [The judge ordinary read his judgment upon this question in that case.] To this I have only to add that I agree with my brother Pigott, that if the 1st section of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144 had been confined to conferring upon the judge ordinary the powers of the "full Court," there might be ground for the suggestion that the expression "full Court" was used in a technical sense as meaning the three judges who, before the passing of that statute, sat to hear suits for dissolution and nullity. There was no statutory definition of the full Court, but it consisted of a certain number of judges, of whom it was necessary that three should be present. But the section goes on to say, "or by three or more judges of the said Court." Now, the full Court never consisted of more than three judges. Something more, therefore, was intended than the full Court of three judges. It seems to me, therefore, that under this section also the judge ordinary alone has power to make the rules—p. 350.

BRETT, J.—The importance of the decision of Sir C. Cresswell in Bawden v. Bawden is therefore attacked. It was said by the learned counsel at the bar that it was a pauper case, and therefore, probably, any reason was thought sufficient to get rid of the suit. To anyone who knew the late Sir C. Cresswell, his chivalrous honour, his intellectual ardour for right decision in matters of law, and his utter disregard and contempt for superior station of parties in litigation, such an assertion is not merely deplorable, it is, to use the mildest word, futile. The authority of Bawden v. Bawden cannot be diminished one iota by the only refutation of it which has been suggested. Your lordships must deal with that case upon the footing that it was as much a deliberate and carefully-considered opinion as any ever given by that learned and conscientious judge.—p. 55.

KEATING, J. to the same effect.

KELLY, CB.—It may be convenient here to refer to Bawden v. Bawden, in which Sir C. Cresswell, undoubtedly a judge of great learning and high authority, decided that a suit like this could not be proceeded with against a respondent who had become insane. But this decision, if it can be called a decision, was certainly pronounced under circumstances detracting from the weight to which it might otherwise have been entitled. The respondent was a pauper inmate in a workhouse, and a guardian the overseer of the parish. We find no trace of any argument at the bar, and no reasons delivered from the bench. A case was referred to as a supposed precedent, which turns out to have been no decision at all. And if the view which I take of the Act of Parliament, under which this proceeding was instituted, be correct, the case itself stands alone, as an example of a Court taking upon itself to put an end to a suit lawfully instituted, by an arbitrary act, unauthorised by the common law, and directly opposed to the provisions of an Act of Parliament.—p. 61.

LORD CHELMSFORD—Great stress has been laid on the judgment of Sir C. Cresswell in Bawden v. Bawden, and of Lord Penzance in the present case, as proceeding from judges of the highest authority, and more particularly consonant with the procedure of the Divorce Court. But, as the question before your lordships depends entirely upon a judicial construction of an Act of Parliament, those eminent judges cannot derive any peculiar advantage from their experience of the practice of that Court.—p. 65.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I ought not to omit noticing Bawden v. Bawden. The decision there adds the weight of Sir C. Cresswell's opinion to that of the majority of the judges in the present case, and of the judge ordinary, and I admit that weight, and regard his judgment as worthy of all respect, but where no argument could be had on one side the weight of all decisions must be greatly impaired.—p. 70.

BARNES, J.—Since the [Matrimonial Causes] Act of 1860, the question has arisen in three cases in Grieve v. Grieve and Carow v. Carow persons charged with adultery by the Queen's Proctor sought to intervene, but these applications were refused. I think the ground of those decisions is that there was no power to allow them, as intervention is only permitted in the specific cases, which are provided for under sect. 28 of the [Matrimonial Causes] Act of 1857.

In Wheeler v. Wheeler and Rhodes a person charged, like the applicant, by a respondent with adultery, applied for leave to intervene. In that case the answer, though it did not in terms claim cross-relief against the petitioner, claimed "such further or other relief as to the Court may seem fit," and this being so, the judge held that it was in effect a cross-petition, and allowed the application, basing the decision on this very ground, and as I read his judgment, expressly declining to decide the point raised. My impression is that he thought that the respondent could have been compelled to cite the applicant, and that it did not much matter whether he was cited or allowed to intervene.—p. 59

JENKINS, P.—In Jones v. Jones I am correctly reported as having expressed to Barnes, J. my belief that his judgment was in accordance with the decisions I had previously given in similar cases. The subject has since been under the consideration of the C. A. in Saunders v. Saunders, and I think it desirable to state how I conceive the practice now stands, having regard to the decision of that tribunal, which must of course be followed here. The general effect of sect. 28 of the Act of 1857 has long since been determined. In Pitt v. Pitt Lord Penzance pointed out, and I gather, on the whole, that the same view is adopted by the C. A. in Saunders v. Saunders, that the words "alleged adulterer" do not mean a person charged by name in the petition, but that in every case where adultery is charged there is an alleged adulterer. In other words, where adultery is alleged, ex necessitate rei an adulterer is alleged, though it may be that he cannot be identified with any person, living or dead. It has always appeared to me, therefore, that the mere belief of the petitioner, founded on the insufficiency of the evidence then before him, that a person accused of being the adulterer is not guilty, cannot be sufficient to excuse his being made a co-respondent, because, if so, there would practically never be a call on the Court to exercise its discretion, and I did not understand the language used by the learned judge in Jones v. Jones to state more than this. Of a principle stated with thus exact limitation, which can hardly be considered a rule, I do not understand the C. A. to express disapproval. But if the petitioner can go farther, and satisfy the Court that no evidence can be obtained against the man accused, then the authority of Saunders v. Saunders shows that there may be a case for relieving the petitioner from making a co-respondent.—p. 2

C.*—As for the authorities, all those which have been cited in argument are, with one exception, Prole v Soady, unfavourable to the plaintiff's contention, and I do not think that that case affords any support to it, for I am utterly unable to see that it has any real bearing on the question of status. The observations I there used are these "I am of opinion that according to the Act, it is impossible to hold otherwise than that the order nisi is the decree which the Court eventually makes absolute against the parties. Therefore, I think the order absolute in this case took effect from the date of the order nisi, and that everything done in the interval was subject to the danger of being set aside by the order becoming absolute." And I am of opinion that those observations were correct with reference to the case with which the Court then had to deal. It was not there intended to lay down as a broad rule that in all cases, and for all purposes, the decree, upon being made absolute, relates back to the date of the order nisi. So to construe the above observations is to overlook the important qualifying words "in this case", they must be construed with reference to the particular subject-matter then before the Court. There the question was whether a husband or his assignee could reduce into possession a fund standing in Court to the wife's credit after a decree nisi had been pronounced for the dissolution of the marriage. It is one thing for a Court of equity to refuse to allow a husband, after a decree nisi has been pronounced, to reduce his wife's choses in action into possession, and thereby defeat her right of survivorship, it is quite another thing to say that the decree nisi alters the status of the parties. I am of opinion then that until the legislature otherwise orders, the status of a married woman remains the same until the decree is made absolute.—p. 363 BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

BRETT, L.J.—Until the decree is absolute there is no decree at all. On this point I think Hulse v Hulse is decisive.—p. 461.

COLLINS, J.—Blackhall v. Blackhall is not in point. The ruling must be read in the light of the circumstances of the case, and the point before the Court at the time. The petitioner had claimed a divorce, the respondent and co-respondent had pleaded connivance; the Queen's Proctor intervened in the interest of the co-respondent to establish connivance between the petitioner and respondent. The co-respondent was not made a party, and Butt, J., did not think he could treat him as a party against whom he could make an order. In this case the Queen's Proctor has intervened, and has charged collusion between the petitioner and co-respondent. He has made the co-respondent a party. He is a party, and I have ample power to deal with him as a party.—p. 85.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.J.J.)—Gandy v. Gandy came twice before the C.A.—first, on one state of facts; and secondly, on another and quite different state of facts. The first decision of Gandy v. Gandy appears to have been greatly misunderstood. [His lordship explained both decisions and continued.] The short result of Gandy v. Gandy may be summed up thus: first, Lord Hauser's decision that continued chastity was an implied condition in separation decrees was overruled; secondly, in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy, the Court held the wife bound by her agreement, there being no circumstances to relieve her from it, and no power in the Divorce Court to disregard her covenant; thirdly, in the second case of Gandy v. Gandy, the wife having the custody of the children and the husband refusing to support them, she was held no longer bound by the covenants in the separation deed; and the Divorce Court being free to disregard it, had power to do what it thought just in making her an allowance in the shape of alimony, and to take into account whatever circumstances it considered material in arriving at a conclusion as to what was just under the altered position of the parties fourthly, nothing was decided respecting any of the statutory powers of the Divorce Courts in suits for dissolution of marriage. fifthly, nothing was decided in the first suit of Gandy v Gandy as to the power of the Divorce Court to make orders respecting the custody, maintenance and education of the children—p 73.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that as regards the first question, whether looking to the whole tenor of the deed on its true construction the covenant to pay the annuity is to endure only so long as the marriage endureth, we are bound by the authority of Charlesworth v Holt. But I must say that, so far as my own opinion is concerned, though I am bound by the authority, if the matter were res integra I should have hesi-tated long to come to the same conclusion. But if this authority is to be overruled it must be in

CURTON, J.—We have the authority of Lord Eldon in Bateman v. Ross (County) (supra) that cohabitation and reconciliation put an end to all the effects of separation. This is the general principle. . . . The first case I shall refer to is Randle v. Gould. There was an express agreement in that case that the provision for the wife was to come to an end in the event of the parties agreeing in writing to return to cohabitation, and it was held that as there was a condition respecting the kind of reconciliation which should put an end to the agreement, it excluded the contention that a different kind of reconciliation would have that effect. Undoubtedly there was a dictum of Lord Campbell, who delivered the judgment of the Court, to the effect that even if there had been no such express proviso he could not have held that there was an implied condition that the agreement should be avoided by reconciliation and renewed cohabitation. I doubt whether I should have agreed with the dictum. At all events it is not a decision governing the present case. In Crouch v. Waller there were two deeds, one of which contained an express proviso that it was to be void in case of a renewal of cohabitation, and it was contended that the other deed was avoided also by reconciliation, but it was held that inasmuch as that deed contained a provision for future children of the marriage it must be treated as a post-nuptial settlement which will not come to an end on the termination of the separation. It is true that Randle v. Gould was referred to by the L.C. in that case without disapproval, I think it will, therefore, be right for me to express my disapproval of the dictum of Lord Campbell in Randle v. Gould, lest it should be said hereafter that it was approved of by this Court. Then there was Charlieworth v. Holt, but that has no bearing upon the present question. In that case it was held that a subsequent divorce dissolving the marriage did not put an end to the wife's rights under a separation deed. . . . Undoubtedly it was there [Negus v. Myster] held that the provisions in a separation deed for the wife's benefit continued though the separation was at an end. But there was no principle there laid down which can bind us to come to any conclusion different from that which I have stated, namely, that this case falls within the general rule. The agreement was made expressly subject to the decree for judicial separation being pronounced.—pp 526, 528.

BRETT, M.—That case [Scholey v. Goodman] is simply a decision as to the old law of pleading; it is not an authority upon any other question—p 795

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first [question] is whether the adultery of the wife is a defence to the action for the annuity. Now that appears to me to be settled, and to be settled by long authority, both at law and in equity, that it would be wrong for us to disturb that rule, even although we thought it unsound. It has been settled for at least 100 years, as may be seen by tracing the cases back from Seagrave v. Seagrave (supra, col 1241) and Jee v. Thurlow (supra, col 1239). The earliest cases that I need mention are Sidney v. Sidney (supra), decided in 1734, and Blount v. Winter (supra), decided in 1781, in these the matter was discussed, and from the time of these decisions it has not been seriously argued in Courts of either law or equity. I am aware that dicta may be found in the Court of Arches (see Sullivan v. Sullivan) which are not altogether in accordance with the view which has been taken in other cases. But this is a mere action at common law for an annuity due under a deed, and to that action adultery is no answer. That I take to be perfectly settled.—p 809.

ROMILLY, M.R.—With respect to the jurisdiction of the Court, which is exceedingly important in matters of this description, Vansittart v. Vansittart is constantly referred to, and, although that is an old case, in so far that it was before the statute passed for the regulation of the Court of Divorce under the present system, it was there laid down that if a husband, by a deed or by an agreement in that case it was only an agreement, agreed to abandon all his parental duties, and transfer them to the wife to be performed by her, this Court would not specifically enforce a contract of that description. Then on the other hand, a case afterwards came before me which was unquestionably a case likely to try the principle very strongly—Seyff v. Seyff—where the father had been guilty of moral turpitude towards his own child, a little girl of seven years old and thereupon he consented to a deed by which the children were taken away from him and conveyed to the mother. He repented of that afterwards, refused to pay anything under that deed, and insisted that he should have possession of the children, upon which the mother instituted a suit to prevent him from so doing. Thereupon I endeavoured to point out that the limit of the jurisdiction must be defined in this manner, that the foundation of the jurisdiction lay in determining what was for the good of society in general, that it was against public policy to allow a father, under ordinary circumstances, to abandon his duties as a parent, and to allow another person to undertake those duties, and that there was no consideration which would be sufficient to enable a father to take that course. But on the other hand, a different and controlling equity arose where the father had shown himself utterly incompetent to perform those duties, and where he had so ill-behaved himself that the institution of this Court was necessary for the protection of his children, in which case the jurisdiction is constantly exercised by this Court—the children being made wards of Court, and an application to take the children away from the custody of their parent allowed and complied with. And accordingly, in Seyff v. Seyff, it was held that the Court would have enforced this equity, and would have prevented the parent from taking the custody of his own children, that in that state of circumstances, if a contract were made which really had for its object, not a violation of public policy by taking away the parental duties, but the enforcement of what was due to public policy by preventing the demoralization of the children by their own father, the Court would interfere at least to that extent. Accordingly, I so held in that suit, and upon appeal my judgment was affirmed by the L J—p. 519.

Gilbert v. Lewis and Lewis v. Mathews, advised.

Massy v. Rowen (1869) L. R. 4 II. L. 288; 23 L. T. 141.—H.L. (IR.); affirming Ir. R. 1 Eq. 110.—C.A. BLACKBURNES, L.C. and CHRISTIAN, J., HATHERLEY, L.C.—The word "separate" is sometimes used alone; but if the word "sole" is used, it is never used alone, that I can find, in any book or precedent. Nor has it been attempted to be shown in the present case, as it would have been competent for the parties to show, according to the recognised doctrine in Ray, Ex parte, that the practice of conveyancers has been modelled according to a given construction of the word "sole". The only authorities which require to be noticed upon this subject are, first, Adamson v. Armitage, before Sir W. Grant, which regard being had to the character of that judge, would be undoubtedly a case of very great authority; if we could find the principle clearly established in it, that the word "sole" of itself had the efficacy which has been attributed to it by the appellants. But I think there are two circumstances which militate against that conclusion being drawn from the decision of Sir W. Grant. The one is, that the question which really arose in that case was, whether a life interest of an absolute interest had been conferred. And there was there also an intimation of trustees with reference to the sole benefit of the person who was intended to take And, with reference to circumstances in that case which would seem in some respects to have created a life interest alone, except for other passages in the will, it became incumbent on Sir W. Grant to consider whether an interpretation might not properly be put on the word "sole," as there introduced, to the extent, that during the lifetime of the lady, in the case of any after-taken husband (she was not married at the time, but she might have married afterwards), the interest should be applied for his use, she having, nevertheless, a full and complete and beneficial ownership in the whole. Besides that, one cannot help feeling that the case is not to be regarded as a leading case impressing upon the word "sole" this technical meaning, because, in reading Sir W. Grant's judgment, you see that in the conclusion to which he comes he relies upon the whole will, and upon the cases in which it had been held that words of such import as "payment for the wife's own use and benefit," or "payment to her own hands," had received the construction of creating a separate use—words which undoubtedly, since his day, have been held not to have any such effect properly attributable to them. I cannot, therefore, look upon that as a case which has settled and determined the law.

In that case [Killick, Ex parte], undoubtedly, the V.-C., in deciding the case, did throw out some observations strongly tending in the direction contended for by Mr. Williams, but the character of the case itself is such that I think all judges would have concurred in the conclusion which was arrived at, because the character of the limitations showed the intention of excluding the husband from either portion of the property conveyed. That again [Green v. Britten, supra] is a case of a similar description, where the whole purport of the instrument clearly indicated a separation of the interest of the wife from the control and influence of the husband. That being so, on the other hand, we have Gilbert v. Lewis . . . and Lewis v. Mathews . . .

And it appears to me that in those cases the learned judges who decided them had not anything before them which ought to have embarrassed them in coming to the conclusion to which they did come, that the word "sole" was not a technical word. I have referred to the authorities which existed at the time when these decisions took place. Both of those learned judges came to a conclusion which I think will warrant your lordships in saying that if there is any weight to be given at all to the effect to be produced upon the minds of conveyancers and those who have to advise upon instruments of that kind, in consequence of a decision, the only effect would be this, that there is nothing anterior to those judgments which necessarily affixed a technical meaning to this word "sole"—and that those judges, not being embarrassed with any such previous conclusion, have now sufficiently established the contrary proposition.—pp 294–297. LORDS COLONEL and CAIRNS concurred.

Headnote—Property to which at the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a woman married before the Act was entitled subject to a life estate, but not for her separate use, held not to become her separate estate by falling into possession after the commencement of the Act. If a woman married before the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has before the commencement of the Act acquired a title, whether vested or contingent, and whether in reversion or remainder, to any property, such property is not made her separate estate by sect. 6 of the Act, though it falls into possession after the Act.

(There had been considerable difference of opinion among the judges of first instance in the Chancery Division upon the true construction of this sect. 5, but it may now be taken that Heul v. Reid has definitely settled the law on the question, and this being so, that the effect of this decision is to overrule Baynton v. Collins, Thompson and Carson, In re, and Leaper's Trusts, In re, and to uphold Tucker, In re, and Adams' Trusts, In re. In fact, Baynton v. Collins, on which the other two depended, according to Bowen, L.J., at p. 410, "cannot be sustained."]

STIRLING, J. —That [Adam's Policy Trusts, In re (supra)] was a decision that sect. 10 of the [Married Women's Property] Act of 1870, had not been repealed, but that is made more clear by the report of the case in the Law Times Reports. It appears that the petition was entitled, "In the matter of the Married Women's Property Acts, 1870 and 1874, and also in the matter of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852," and counsel suggested that it might be proper to amend the petition if the Court thought it unnecessary that it should be entitled in the latter Acts as well as in the Act of 1870, but that from the wording of sect. 11 of the Act of 1882 it did not appear whether it was intended to apply to a policy effected before as well as to one effected after the passing of the Act, whereupon Chitty, J. remarked that he thought that the Act of 1882 was prospective only, for that the words "shall vest" related only to the future, and counsel then suggesting that the petition should be amended by striking out the rest of the title, and entitling it only in the Act of 1870, Chitty, J. expressed his concurrence, and I have ascertained that this was done, and the order was actually made under the Act of 1870. Then there was Soutar's Policy Trusts, In re, before Pearson, J., in which Adam's Policy Trusts, In re, does not appear to have been brought to his attention. These counsel used the same argument which has been used with so much effect before Chitty, J., but Pearson, J., said, "I doubt whether sect. 10 of the Act of 1870 remains in force for any purpose, because sect. 11 of the Act of 1882 says that, if at the time of the death of the insured there shall be no trustee, a trustee or trustees may be appointed by any Court having jurisdiction under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1850, or the Acts amending and extending the same." And he directed that the order should be made under all the Acts. I do not, however, read Pearson, J., as doing more than giving an expression of doubt, and I do not take it to be an actual decision — p. 721.

But the point arising from the Statute of Frauds was not raised in the case, and the doubt expressed by Turner, L.J., in Field v. Moore as to the sufficiency of the evidence of the agreement in

Rippon v Daeding, probably refers to this want of a writing signed by the wife.—p 447

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Then we come to the direction that the interest which any female might take under the will should be for her sole and separate use, and without power to anticipate, STANDARD WHEN A GIFT OF A SUM OF MONEY WAS EQUIVALENT TO A GIFT OF A PERPETUAL ANNUITY. AND IT IS CONSISTENT WITH THE DECISION OF BACON, V.C. IN Croughton's Trusts, in re, where the gift was held to be equivalent to a gift of a sum of money. With respect to the third case, Clarke's Trust, in re, I am unable to agree with it. So far as giving the sum of cash to the married woman I think it was right, but I cannot agree with Fry, L.J., so far as he decided that she was entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the stock in Court, because, although formerly an income-bearing fund, it had been converted into cash. It cannot make any difference that a sum of money which was at the testator's death invested on mortgage has been converted into cash. In the present case we have a gift substantially of a sum of cash, although invested at the time. Therefore I think that the person having survived at which this lady was to become entitled to the fund, she can give a valid receipt for it, and is entitled to have it paid to her. I also wish to say that I agree with the decision in Sykes's Trusts, in re — p. 420.

COTTON, L.J.—It has long been settled that when money is given to a woman for her separate use, inasmuch as the separate use is a creature of equity, she may be restrained from anticipating the income. Baggett v. Meux decided that this applied not only to a life interest but to separate interest given to a married woman absolutely. — p. 422.

Bown, in re, followed reluctantly, Spencer v. Thomas v. Spencer (1885) 55 L. J. Ch. 80; 30 Ch. D. 183, 31 W. R. 62. — PEARSON, J. explained. Chutey, in re, Gibson v. Way (1886) 55 L. J. Ch. 806, 32 Ch. D. 361, 54 L. T. 655; 34 W. R. 641. — CHITTY, J. And see post, col. 126.

Baggett v. Meux (supra), dictum approved. Stogdon v. Lee (1891) 60 L. J. Q. B. 66 [1891] 1 Q. B. 661; 64 L. T. 494, 39 W. R. 467; 55 J. P. 533. — C.A.

ESHER, M.R.—Then as to the will of the first husband, the question arises whether the will declaring that the defendant is not to have power to "alienate, charge, or anticipate" the income of the 5,000*l.* are of themselves, there being other words that would do so, sufficient to give her a separate estate as against her husband whether these words authorised the Court to draw the inference that the income was intended to be the wife's separate property. Upon that point there is the dictum of Knight Bruce, V. [in Baggett v. Meux], a very powerful judge and master of this branch of the law, which, although it was not necessary for the decision of that particular case, is part of his considered judgment. He there says, in the most deliberate and explicit terms, that words, similar to those in the will in the present case, prohibiting alienation of property by a married woman, are of no effect unless the property is limited to her separate use. The language of Lord Langdale in Tillotson v. Armstrong (supra, col. 1255) shows that he took precisely the same view—p. 670.

COLORIDGE, C.J.—In Bown, In re, it was held that the testator intended the legatees to have the capital paid to them, but in the other case, Grey's Settlements, In re, it was decided that the testator must be taken to have intended the legacies to remain in the hands of the trustees with a restraint on anticipation by the legatees. Both these decisions are, in my opinion, right, and consistent with each other. In Bown, In re, there was a direction to "pay" to the legatee after the death of the tenant for life. This showed the testator's intention to be that the shares of that legatee should then be handed over to her, and the restraint on anticipation was, therefore, held to be confined to the antecedent period. In Grey's Settlements, In re, there were no words showing an intention that the legacies should be paid over, and the restraint on anticipation was held to be general—p. 147.

There was a trust for separate use, not limited in duration, with a special reference to the present husband, and it was held that it did not prevent the trust from applying to a future coverture. In that case [Sturgis v. Corp] there was existing property settled with reference to an existing coverture; and the Court arrived at the conclusion that the lady could dispose of her interest, even though she was not in actual enjoyment of the property. But when I look at the words of the settlement in the case before us, I am of opinion that the trust for separate use applies to a future coverture only—p. 725.

MALINS, V.-C.—It had been stated that it had been held in America [Funderhayden v. Mallory (1 Comstock 452)] that Biscoe v. Kennedy was not law. That might be the case in America, but in this country he was bound to assume that Biscoe v. Kennedy was law. It had been consistently cited by text writers without objection. [His honour referred to Roper on Husband and Wife, vol. 2, 2nd edition, p. 240.] In his opinion Biscoe v. Kennedy was good law, and was a sound and useful decision. He should follow that case cheerfully, because he thought it was founded upon justice and honesty.—p. 331

COTTON, L.J.—The case which is most similar to this is Vaughan v. Williamson, before Bacon, V.-C., in which the judge relied on the fact that the claimant had brought his action as soon as there was any fund out of which he could be paid, because the only property of the married woman was that which she got from her father, and that had only lately been realised. Mr. Fischer sought to make that argument applicable to the present case, and he relied on the fact that the property which passed under the testatrix's will became liable to the claim within six years. But there was property settled to her separate use ever since 1875, which could have been made available. Therefore the ground relied on by Bacon, V.-C. fails in the present case, and I have some doubt whether the V.-C. was right in the reliance he placed on that ground, because the statute begins to run as soon as an action can be brought to enforce the claim, irrespective of there being any property.

Norton v. Turvill is very shortly reported. The lady had a power to appeal by deed or will, and she gave a bond for 267. Of course, an action could have been brought against her on that bond, but, as I understand the judgment of the M.R., he considered the execution of the bond as an exercise of her power of disposition. . . . The M.R. looked upon the bond, erroneously, as I think, as an execution of the power which the settlement gave her, so that the creditor became creditor que trust under it. That seems to be the ground of his judgment. Beasley v. Thomas (supra, col. 1258) does not appear to help us in this case, it turns on quite a different point. Then in Vaughan v. Walker the L.C. of Ireland held that the Statute of Limitations did not run against the creditors of a married woman; but the L.J. differed from that view, and I must express my opinion that the L.C. was wrong in the view which he took, and that he did not deal with the liability of the separate estate of a married woman as we ought to deal with it.—p. 688

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that Kay, J. was right in saying that Norton v. Turvill is to be explained by saying that the bond was held to have acted as an appointment making the trustee of the settlement a trustee for the obligee of the bond. But that view is now exploded.—p. 634 LOPES, L.J. concurred.

JAMES, L.J. (for self, SIR D. PEACOCK, MELLISH, L.J. and SIR M. SMITH).—It is true, that in Shattock v Shattock the M.R. expressly overruled the judgment of TURNER, L.J. in Johnson v Gallagher, and held, that even a promissory note given by a married woman living separate and apart from her husband, and having property settled to her separate use for life, with a power to appoint it by will, was not a debt payable out of the property so appointed. In that judgment he bases his dissent from TURNER, L.J., on the ground, that the authorities cited by the latter do not warrant his conclusion. Their lordships are not able to concur in that view of the authorities, and have arrived at the conclusion, that TURNER, L.J.'s judgment is expressed with his usual accuracy. One of the cases, Heatley v Thomas, when carefully examined, is a direct authority for the L.J.'s proposition.—p. 594.

FRY, J.—In those cases declarations had been made declaring that the separate estate of the married woman was charged in the absence of the trustees—and I am not prepared to say that where the trustees cannot be found, as in Collett v Dickenson, that may not be a convenient and very proper course to pursue, but it is a course of great inconvenience as a course which leads to a great deal of, as it seems to me, needless expense; because, when the matter comes back on further consideration in such a state, all the Court can do is to repeat the declaration made at the hearing, reducing to a certainty the amount of the charge, and reducing to a certainty the amount of the separate estate, and then to leave the whole matter to be worked out, if necessary, by subsequent proceedings. The course, therefore, is inconvenient, and I refuse this application with costs.—p. 151.

JAMES, L.J.—The language of the decree in Picard v Hine, which gave the plaintiff a charge upon the separate estate remaining, was intended to give effect to the rule that the creditor had a claim against the estate, but not a charge upon it, so as to prevent the operation of any intermediate alienation, and therefore the inquiry was directed what separate estate remained, meaning only what part remained of that separate estate in respect of which the married woman had at the time of contracting the debt a ius disponendi. That is evidently what was before the Court, no such point having been suggested as that she had acquired the general power of contracting debts to be paid out of any separate estate she might afterwards acquire. The misconception has arisen from not attending to what were the facts of the cases in which that inquiry was directed. I desire to have it distinctly understood as my opinion, and the opinion of my colleagues, and therefore as the decision of this Court, that in any future case the proper inquiry to be made is what was the separate estate which the married woman had at the time of contracting the debt or engagement, and whether that separate estate, or any part of it, still remains capable of being reached by the judgment and execution of this Court. The decision in Johnson v Gallagher was that the debt of the married woman, although she had separate estate, did not prevent her disposing of that separate estate any more than the contracting of a debt prevents a man from disposing of any part of his estate—p. 160

BRETT, L.J.—Roberts v. Ifathus and Sykes's Trusts, In re (supra, col. 1253), are adverse to the case of the plaintiffs, and with those decisions I entirely agree—p. 163

COTTON, L.J.—As regards Godfrey v. Harben, which was pressed upon us, that to some extent favours the contention of the respondents. I think it better not to give any opinion on the point there decided, as it may come to the C.A., but that case went very much further than the case it was supposed to follow. As I understand that case, the decision was that the power of appointment by will connected with the separate life estate, when exercised, made the appointed property separate property. In London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Lemprière there was power to appoint by deed or will, which makes a great difference between that case and the case before Hall, V.-C. However, I express no opinion upon that case, except to point out that distinction, leaving the case entirely free if and when it comes before the C.A.—p. 166

JAMES, L.J.—I may say as regards Flopper v. Buller, and Roberts v. Watkins, that in the former case Denman, J., must be understood as merely following what he thought was the decision of Malins, V.-C. [in Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 14 Ch. D. 837], and the judgment of Lush, L.J. in the latter case seems to me from beginning to end to be expressed with absolute accuracy.—b.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Since this case was argued yesterday I have looked at Glavin, In re, a little more closely. It appears to me that that case, and the reasoning on which it is based, do not apply to the present case at all. In the first place, in Glavin, In re, no proceedings had been taken by the lady under the Act [Married Women's Property Act, 1882]. She sued by her next friend. In the second place, there was no order on the married woman to pay the costs. In the third place, the order of Bacon, V.-C. which was appealed against, authorised the trustees to retain the costs out of future accruing separate estate—and to that extent it was obviously wrong. But there was this further point raised in that case. There was a small sum of 36l., which was said to be arrears, and it was contended that this might be impounded or retained by the trustees. But when we look at the judgment we find that this small sum of 36l., accrued after the order on further consideration, which did not order her to pay the costs, but ordered her next friend to pay them, and the Court there came to the conclusion that even that sum could not be attached. There is language in the judgment that goes the length of intimating an opinion that the only arrears that could be attached were arrears that had accrued at the time of the institution of the suit. The main controversy was obviously not about that sum, which was merely a small item in the matter; the main controversy was the propriety of the V.-C.'s order entitling the trustees to retain the costs out of the subsequent income of the married woman, as to which she was restrained from anticipation. In Hyde v. Hyde (supra) the C.A., in dealing with a sequestration, allowed the sequestrator to attach and take in execution the arrears of a married woman's separate estate which were due at the time the sequestration issued, and they made no reference there to any earlier time. But apart from that it appears to me that what we have to deal with is, not Glanville, In re, but the Married Women's Property Act. I confess I am not at all disposed to extend the decision in Glanville, In re, to a case which arises under that Act, for several reasons. In the first place, the Court itself, in Glanville, In re, declined to say what would be right in a case arising under the Act. Fry, L.J., is pointed upon that. He says "The action was begun in 1882, before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. How the case would have stood if the plaintiff had been suing without a next friend, under the provisions of that Act, I give no opinion; the question is one of some difficulty, and is not now before us." That is precisely the question which we have to deal with. The Married Women's Property Act, s. 1, enables a married woman to sue without a next friend; and, what is far more important to my mind is this, that the Act departs from the principle upon which Pike v Fitzgibbon was decided, and which was taken as the foundation of the decision in Glanville, In re. The Act, as I understand it, alters the whole law as laid down in Pike v Fitzgibbon—p. 632.

LINDLEY, M.R.—When we bear in mind that the protection order was obtained in February, 1880, and that Mrs Walker then became under ss. 21, 25, and 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, in the position of a jure uxoris as regards her property, and capable of contracting debts and obligations, we can see that the case does not come within the principle of the decision in Roper, In re, the ratio decidendi in which was that the married woman there concerned was not capable of contracting debts and obligations within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—p. 282. v. WILLIAMS, J.—Reliance was placed upon the doctrine of Lindley, L.J., in Holtby v Hodgson to the effect that upon the death of the husband such an execution could issue. He says "Suppose her husband were to die the restraint would is gone, the judgment would bind her, and execution could be issued upon it." If that is right, I agree that Mr Mackenzie's contention would be sound. But I think it is not right. It seems to me that Beckett v Tasker (post, col 1268) and Pelton v Harrison (No. 1), (post, col 1268) are both authorities to show that the death of the husband does not convert a judgment in the form in Scott v Morley (post, col 1287) into a judgment upon which the widow can be possibly called upon to pay —p. 382 KENNEDY, J. concurred

V WILLIAMS, L.J. (after discussing Scott v Morley (post, col 1287), Pelton v Harrison, (No. 1) (post), Beckett v Tasker (post), Fallier v Gwynne (supra, col 1266), and Pelley v Griffith (supra, col 1267), continued). The only authority which at all conflicts with this continuous line of decisions is Holtby v Hodgson, or, rather, the dictum of Lindley, L.J., in his judgment in that case, to the effect that separate property that she (the wife) is restrained from anticipating, which cannot be got at in any way while her husband is living, becomes immediately subject to the judgment as soon as he is dead. The judgment itself in Holtby v Hodgson involved no such proposition. The husband in that case was alive, and the only question in the case was whether a judgment obtained against a married woman in her husband's lifetime, substantially in the Scott v Morley form, in an action on a contract made by her during coverture, could be enforced by a garnishee order under Ord. XLV. 1.1, attaching a judgment debt due on a judgment recovered by her in an action for malicious prosecution brought by her during coverture. The Court held that the judgment created an attachable debt. There is nothing in this judgment, or in the finding that a married woman is under such a contract a personal debtor, inconsistent with the limitation of the contracting power of a married woman, or with the limitation of the satisfaction of damages recovered against her to separate property coming to her possession during coverture, which seem to me to be the limitations established by the cases to which I have called attention. Holtby v Hodgson was followed in Pelton v Harrison (No. 2) (supra, col 1268). In which it was held that a judgment against a married woman is a personal one, although enforceable against her separate estate only, and that costs due to a married woman in respect of an interlocutory application might be satisfied by an order for set-off under Ord. LXV. r. 27, sub-r. 21, of costs due from the married woman under a judgment in the Scott v Morley form. Pelton v Harrison (No. 1) was cited, but neither Lopes, L.J., nor Kay, L.J., seem to have considered that case inconsistent with Holtby v Hodgson. It is further to be observed that both in Pelton v Harrison (No. 1) and in Beckett v Tasker the judgment in the Scott v Morley form was obtained in actions brought after the death

COZENS-HARDY, J. (after referring to a number of cases, continued). It seems to me to follow, from the authorities I have cited, that separate estate may be said to exist notwithstanding discovery. It is "suspended" in this sense—that the widow's power of disposition over it is the same as if it had been given to her simply and without words creating a separate use. It is not extinct, because it becomes operative upon a second marriage. If the coverture ends by her death it is still regarded as her separate estate, and is applied in satisfaction of her debts and liabilities. If the coverture ends by her husband's death the same principle ought to apply. Unless, therefore, I am constrained by authority, I should hold that the combined effect of the two sections [sect. 1, sub sect. 5 and sect. 19] of the Act of 1882 to which I have referred was to vest in the trustee the whole of the life interest of Mrs. Ryan, subject only and except so far as it was protected by the restraint upon anticipation, and that directly the restraint upon anticipation ceased by Mr. Ryan's death, the title became free from impediment. But it has been strongly argued that I am not at liberty to take this view, in consequence of the decision of the C.A. in Pelton Bros v Harrison (No. 1). In that case judgment had been obtained against a married woman in the form settled in Scott v Morley (post, col 1287). This judgment was obtained after her husband's death, but in respect of a contract entered into during coverture, and the question was whether a receiver had been properly appointed of the property of the married woman as to which during the coverture she had been restrained from anticipating. The C.A. held that the judgment creditor could not attach this property, and Kay, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "The question is whether under this judgment the property which the married woman was restrained from anticipating can be affected, The shortest answer is that the judgment expressly directs that there shall be no execution against such property, and in my opinion it is as completely excepted from the consequences of the judgment as if it had been specifically mentioned in it, and stated to be excepted because the married woman was restrained from anticipating it." This, of course, was a sufficient ground for the decision. But the Lord Justice proceeds to discuss the Act of 1882, s. 1, sub-s. 2 and 4, and uses language upon which great reliance is placed. "But it is argued that when the husband died this property was still separate property, and that by the death of the husband the restraint on anticipation was gone, and it may therefore be treated as separate property acquired upon the death of the husband. The answer to this argument is, that there is no such thing as separate property of an unmarried woman. Separate property means property held separately from the husband." This case turned upon sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, which may be called the contract section, and not upon sub-sect. 5, which is the bankruptcy section. But I have felt great difficulty in consequence of these weighty observations of Kay, L.J. They were not, however, necessary to the decision of the case, and they seem to me not to be consistent with the views expressed by the C.A. itself in Pike v. Fitzgibbon (supra, col. 1262), and by other judges in many cases, to some of which I have referred.—p. 667.

KAY, J.—In Knight v Knight the debt which it was sought to set off was a debt due from the husband as executor. He himself was the executor, and received assets of the testator who had given the legacy to his wife. He being indebted as executor, the wife sought to have her legacy nevertheless settled upon her, and it was held that no equity to a settlement arose. These other cases were not cited there, but I cannot for a moment imagine that they were not present to the mind of such an accomplished judge as Hall, V.-C., and, therefore, I presume he thought that some difference must have arisen from the fact that the debt in that case was not a debt due to the testator in his lifetime, but was a debt due from the husband as executor of the testator. At present I do not appreciate the difference myself, but I cannot treat it at all as an authority which would in any way overrule Carr v Taylor and Batchelor, in re, both of which cases were decided before it.—p. 481.

The fund here is not a reversionary interest, and the husband has a right to reduce it into possession, which is intercepted by the wife's equity to a settlement. The only question is, therefore, whether that equity is to go beyond making a provision for the wife and her children. In my opinion that point was virtually decided by Lord Cranworth in Carter v Taggart, though down to that time a practice had crept in of giving the wife a power of appointment. In Suggitt's Trusts, in re, Lord Cairns held it inconsistent to interfere with the right of the husband any more than was necessary, and that to give a power of appointment to the wife did go beyond what was necessary. It appears to me, upon the same principle, that the Court would go beyond the necessity of the equity to a settlement if it in fact placed the fund in the position of a reversionary interest. . . . The same form must be used as was used in Spirett v Willows.—p. 483. MELLISH, J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—The question is whether in the discretion of the Court, having regard to all the circumstances, the whole fund ought not to be settled. It is true that, technically speaking, it does not fall within the precise terms used by Lord Cairns in Suggitt's Trusts, In re, but it seems to me that, reading his judgment fairly, he was dealing there only with specific instances of conduct on the part of the husband which would lead the Court to settle the whole fund and it seems to me that these cases might be truly summed up in the term "aggravated misconduct on the part of the husband"—p. 757

Suggitt's Trusts, In re, discussed.

STIRLING, J.—It is true that the property is not very large, but in Suggitt's Trusts, In re, it was held that a smaller sum ought to be apportioned. No doubt in this case the husband is an undischarged bankrupt, and that might be a ground for settling the whole amount upon the wife. Looking, however, at the fact that the husband is earning 18s a week, and that that sum is not likely to be disturbed by his creditors, and looking also at the fact that in Suggitt's Trusts, In re, the husband was only earning 11s a week, I think I shall be properly exercising that discretion which, according to all the authorities, I possess, by directing two-thirds to be settled on the wife—p. 155.

PARKER, B.—The only doubt in this case arose from the observation of Lord Ellenborough in McNeillage v. Holloway, that a promissory note may be treated as a personal chattel in possession. Now in that respect, I think there was a mistake, and an incorrect expression used; but it was unnecessary for his lordship to lay down such a doctrine, in order to decide the case then before him. In fact, the decision in . . . Richards v. Richards has qualified that position. In that case the Court of K. B. said that a promissory note was, in the ordinary course of things, a chose in action, and that there was nothing to take it out of the common rule, that choses in action given to the wife survive to her after the death of her husband, unless he has reduced them into possession—p. 427. ARINGTON, C.B., ALDERSON and ROLFES, B.B. concurred.

PATTERSON, J. (for the Court).—The decision in McNeillage v. Holloway is wholly inapplicable to this case here. The observations of Lord Ellenborough, in giving judgment, are undoubtedly too strong, and have been corrected and modified by this Court in Richards v. Richards (supra), and by the Court of Ex. in Gaters v. Madeley (supra). But even if they were in strict accordance with the law, they would not avail the defendant in this case, for they suppose a reduction into possession by the husband during his wife's life, of which his merely receiving interest in the way stated in this case is not even any evidence—p. 160.

Rogers v. Bolton (1860) 8 L. R. 11, 69 PALLIS, C.B.—There a fraus solis was the cause of a note, married, and died during the husband's lifetime. An action was brought on the note by her administrator, who in that case happened not to be her husband. The question was, whether the note was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and the only mode by which the operation of the statute could be avoided was, by proof of payment of interest within six years. The note had never been reduced into possession—that was an admitted fact. The payment of interest had been to the husband. . .

Two questions arose in that case, which were very much mixed up with each other—one, whether the husband was a competent witness, the other, whether the payment of interest would take the case out of the statute. Patterson, J., in giving judgment, after showing that the note had not been reduced into possession by payment of interest during the coverture, continues—“It was further argued that the husband's evidence did not avail for the purpose for which it was given—the taking of the note out of the Statute of Limitations, but it is clear that it did. If he received the interest, not in his own right, but as agent for his wife—which he clearly did—then the interest, of course, was paid to her.” I do not know that the expression, “paid to the husband as agent for his wife,” is perfectly accurate, but there is no doubt that it was paid to him in right of his wife, and I think the decision is no more than that, as the payment was one in right of the wife, her administrator was entitled to rely upon it, to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations.—p. 73 FITZGERALD, B concurred

REY, J.—This case has found its way into Rolle's Abridgment, Bacon's Abridgment, and other text books, and, so far as I know, it has never been impugned. In it, as in the present case, the husband and wife had appointed an agent to receive the money of the wife, he received it and did not pay it over, and it was held that his receipt operated as a conversion of the money. Does the fact that in the present case the wife was an administratrix and was entitled only to a distributive share of the fund make any difference? It appears that the debts of the intestate had been already paid, and therefore the shares of the next-of-kin under the Statute of Distributions were immediately receivable. The shares were present interests. But, further than that, I think the decision of the H L in Cooper v Cooper (1874) 44 L J. Ch. 6, L. R. 7 H L 53. See "ELECTION," col 970 shows that the fact that the wife was only an administratrix can make no difference — p. 446.

Leach had refused to direct any payment to be made to the representative of the deceased wife, except in the presence of the representative of the deceased husband. Whether that dictum be or be not accurately reported, I will not undertake to say; but in the judgment in which it occurs, Lord Holt differed from the rest of the Court, and the decision was contrary to his opinion. From the decision there was an appeal, which was afterwards abandoned. Lord Fenon (Milbourn v Ewart (supra)), when the case was cited before him, pronounced the opinion there delivered by Lord Holt to be "as repugnant to the rules of law as equity"—p. 87

Ewart*, and was there alleged by counsel to have proceeded on a confusion of legal and equitable principles, and even to have gone beyond that relief which a Court of Equity would have accorded to the obligee. But Lord Kenyon and the other judges upheld Gage v Acton in the strongest terms, and Buller, J., referred to a case of Foord v Foord (Hayes & Foord v Foord, 79 Geo. 3, B. GRANT, M.R.—I have found two cases in the time of Lord Nottingham, to which it is proper to advert, though from the reports, in which they are found, and the position they affirm, they are not entitled to any great attention. Those cases are Brudnell v. Price and Paget v. Paget. In each of them Lord Nottingham is represented to have directed part of the property, settled, or agreed to be settled, upon the wife and children, to be laid out in the purchase of an office for the husband upon the consent of the wife. The proposition that the interest of the children could be affected by her consent, could not be decided or contended. Of Paget v. Paget no mention is made in Lord Nottingham's MS. notes, in the possession of M. Hargrave, Brudnell v. Price is mentioned, but in a way quite different from that represented by the report. According to the MSs. she merely consented that part of her unsettled property should be paid to her husband.—p. 582.

Austin*, Lord Cowper said that the wife had the right of a surety, except as against onerous creditors of the husband, and that against them she had not such right. In Clinton v. Hooper, Lord Thurlow noticed that dictum and said, that he regarded the doctrine as then settled. The decision in Tate v. Austin was affirmed by the H. L., but this doctrine having been only stated there as a dictum, the appeal did not make the dictum stronger.—p. 864.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for self, RIGBY and WILLIAMS, L.JJ.).—The authorities bearing on the subject, beginning with Huntingdon (Earl) v. Huntingdon (Countess), and coming down to Hudson v. Carmichael, show that if a married woman charges her property with money for the purpose of paying her husband's debts, and the money raised by her is so applied, she is primæ facie regarded in equity, and as between herself and him, as lending him and not giving him the money in trust on her property, and as entitled to have her property exonerated by him for the charge she has created. This doctrine is purely equitable, and the authorities which establish it show that it is based on an inference to be drawn from the circumstances of each particular case; the primæ facie inference being in such a case as that supposed that both parties intended that the wife's assistance should be limited to the necessity of the case, and should not go beyond such necessity. But even where the wife charges her property with money to pay her husband's debts incurred without reference to her, there may be circumstances which prevent any inference from arising in her favour. Thus, if a settlement is made by the husband on his wife at the time she charges her estate, he is regarded as purchasing her assistance, and the inference that the parties intended that the wife's property should be exonerated by the husband does not arise.—Lewis v. Nangle, Clinton v. Hooper is the leading authority to show that the doctrine in question is based on an inference to be drawn in each case from all the facts of that particular case. It was long ago settled that although under the old law a husband became liable for the antenuptial debts of the wife, she had no right in equity to compel him to exonerate property of hers charged with those debts, even although he had expressly covenanted to pay them.—See Lewis v. Nangle and Kinnoull (Earl) v. Money.—p. 270.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—One adverse case was cited, which I must notice, May v. Skeay (supra), the marginal note being, "A having gone abroad, and left his wife unprovided for, the plaintiff lent her money to purchase necessaries, and she applied it accordingly—Held, that the plaintiff could not sue A. for the money in a Court of equity." But it appears that the V.C. who decided that case, not holding that there was not a debt due from A. to the plaintiff which might be recovered, proceeded upon the notion that this was a legal debt, the payment of which could not be directed by a Court of equity. His honour more fully explains that as his ratio decidendi in the subsequent case of Holt v. Brien (supra). But this is clearly erroneous: that no action at law could be maintained for such a demand was considered too clear for argument in the recent case of Kumar v. Bushell ((1867) 3 C. B. PARK, J.—I am surprised at the language ascribed to the Court in Horwood v. Haffer, because it is abhorrent from every feeling of a man and a Christian. CHITTY, J.—The meaning of sect. 12 of the [Dower] Act was considered by Malins, V.-C., in Roper v Roper. He held that the widow had no priority over other legacies in respect of an annuity bequeathed to her by her husband in satisfaction of dower where the only real estate of the testator had been conveyed to him with a declaration against dower (see sect. 6). The decision appears to me to be right; but in the report of his judgment there is attributed to the V.-C. a dictum that if the dower had been barred by the will she would have been entitled to priority.

With this dictum I find myself unable to agree.
The statute makes no difference between the effect of a bar by deed and a bar by will—p. 569

JESSEL, M.R.—I certainly must respectfully dissent from some of the observations in Rowland
v. Cuthbertson. . . All that his lordship said was this, "that dealing with the 4th section [Dower Act] I am not sure that that is conclusive on this case, because, in order to dispose of the land the testator must point it out specifically or designate it in some way." But surely that is a mistake, with the greatest possible deference, a testator disposes of his lands by the gift of "all my real estate." His lordship says you cannot dispose of land except by designating it, but will anybody doubt that a gift of "all my real estate" disposes of his lands? I confess I am utterly unable to accede to that view. I think it desirable to express my opinion plainly because this case may be cited hereafter, and may lead to similar difficulties to those which have occurred here. I think the 9th section applies to this case.
It is this, "Where a husband shall devise any land." The odd part of the matter is this, that [Rowland v. Cuthbertson] his lordship held that the 9th section applied, although the words are "any land," the same words as in the 4th section, and the gift there was of "all his real estate," but if he was right as to any doubt about the 4th section, it appears to me that his doubt would have extended to the 9th section. The words are the same. If it required a specific description, I do not understand how he came to the conclusion that the 9th section applied. It appears to me that if his attention had been drawn to that he would have seen, his own decision shows it, that "any land," being the words in the 4th section, there was no reason to a gift of certain articles not expressed to be for her separate use.—p. 492 MORRIS, C.J. concurred.

B. 277; [1893] 1 Q. B. 181, see "BANKRUPTCY" col 137]. It was held that such a gift [of jewels] was a settlement within sect. 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, on the ground that the donor contemplated the retention by his wife of the presents that he gave her. But the inference which I draw from that case is the reverse of that suggested to me. It may well be that a voluntary settlement, voidable by creditors, was created, because the jewels were given, not as some small sums might be given, for immediate expenditure, but to constitute a permanent possession of the wife. But the jewels became the property of the wife, and no doubt she could have given a good title had she sold them. And therefore the inference drawn by the learned judge from the facts, which, as to the occasions of the gifts, were very like those in the present case, was not that the wife took the jewels as paraphernalia, but rather as settled to her separate use. Indeed, it does not seem to have occurred to anyone to think of paraphernalia in connection with the case, though such a view would have been conclusive in favour of the creditors.—p. 40

NORTH, J.—In that case [Jupp, In re] Kay, J. proceeds to deal with cases in which the words are different from those in Warrington v. Warrington, professing to follow those cases. I find in those cases the proposition recognised that a slight difference of language is sufficient to prevent the application of the rule of law on which they are founded. Kay, J. decided that case at variance with what I am deciding. But I do not find that Warrington v. STIRLING, J.—What was decided in Scott v. Morley was, that there was no power under sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, to commit to prison a married woman for her default in paying a sum for which judgment had been recovered against her in a Court of law, and which, under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was payable out of her separate estate, and not otherwise. The proper form of judgment in such a case was settled by the C. A. in Scott v. Morley. That decision, which relates to the application of sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, does not govern the present case; but it is necessary to consider the reasons on which it was based, and to ascertain how they apply. Put shortly, the ratio decidendi appears to be this: sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, conferred on a married woman the capacity of entering into, and rendering herself liable on, any contract as a separate sole, but her liability was strictly limited to her separate estate. And in the event of her dying, or being sued, in which respect she was also put in the position of a separate sole, then, whether the action was in contract or in tort, the damages and costs recovered against her in any action or proceeding were to be payable out of her separate estate, and not otherwise. This enactment, in the words of Bowen, L.J., created only a proprietary and not a personal liability. On the other hand, sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, only authorises a commitment where there is a debt due from the defendant; and a debt payable out of the separate estate of a married woman is not a debt due from her. The order in the present case is not an order for payment of a sum of money to a particular person, but for payment of a sum into Court. The distinction between the two was pointed out and explained in Greer, J. in re Greer v. Parnham (1895) 64 L. J. Ch. 620; [1895] 2 Ch. 217, 13 R. 508, 72 L. T. 865, 43 W. R. 547, 2 Watson 350; 59 J. P. 441.—CHITTY, J. . . . Previously to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the husband was liable, and orders would be naturally sought for and made against him and not against the wife. DeV. v. Hyde and Ottway v. Wing appear to show that attachment might, in a proper case, issue against a married woman.—p. 188

BRETT, M.R. stated the old and well-known rule with regard to the construction of enactments affecting rights, viz., that, unless the language used is clear to the contrary, it must be construed prospectively only, and not retrospectively so as to affect rights acquired before the Act passed. Sub-section 4 of sect. 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, clearly affected rights, and gave to the party with whom a contract was made by a married woman a greater right than he would have had before the Act. [His lordship continued.] The rule, therefore, applies that, unless the words are clear, the enactment is not to be construed retrospectively. It was agreed that the decision of this Court in Weldon v. Winslow is contrary to the view we are now taking, it being there held that the 2nd sub-section of the 1st section was to be construed retrospectively. But the ground of the decision in that case was that no right was affected or altered by the construction there applied to the 2nd sub-section. It was there pointed out that, the action being in tort for personal injuries, and the wife being the meritorious cause of action, the plaintiff could have sued before the Act passed precisely as she did after the Act, subject only to the liability to a plea in abatement, upon which she would have been forced to join the husband for conformity only. It was held, therefore, that there was no question of alteration of a right, but only one of procedure, the effect of sub-section 2 being only to prevent the defendant from objecting that the husband was not joined for conformity. When an Act deals with procedure it affects all subsequent procedure, but it cannot rightly be said therefore to be retrospective, because it is only the subsequent procedure that it affects; it cannot be said to affect any right which existed before the Act. The case of Weldon v. Winslow is, therefore, altogether distinguishable from the present, and is no authority with regard to the construction of a section that affects rights. For these reasons, it appears to me that the judgment of Chitty, J., in Conolan v. Leyland was correct, and that, if the judgment in Bursill v. Tanner was to the contrary, it cannot be supported. The order must be therefore modified so as to be in conformity with the law as it existed previously to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.—p. 236

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I agree. The substantial question we have to decide is whether the 4th sub-section of the 1st section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is retrospective. There appear to have been conflicting decisions on this question in Conolan v. Leyland and Bursill v. Tanner. In Bursill v. Tanner, the Div. Court seems to have proceeded on the assumption that the sub-section was retrospective. But in Conolan v. Leyland, Chitty, J., took a different view, and held that the 4th sub-section was not retrospective. For the reasons given by the M.R., I agree that that construction was correct. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present case to go into the matter, but I desire to reserve for a future occasion the consideration of the question how far the judgment in Bursill v. Tanner is correct with regard to the form of order in cases to which the sub-section applies, as to which I entertain considerable doubt. A modified form of order seems to have since come into use, which was used in the present case, and with regard to the question whether that is entirely free from objection I also reserve my opinion.—p. 237

And in that case the defendant had not pleaded coverture. I take it that the judgment was in the ordinary form of judgment against a defendant who was not a married woman.—p. 975. BAGGALLAY concurred

RIDLEY, J.—Hood-Barrs v Heriot merely decided that an appeal by a married woman was not a "proceeding instituted" by her (within sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893). The case must be in favour of the claimant is Moran v Place where it was decided that a married woman who had entered a curat in respect of a will had not "instituted the proceedings" in the probate action. But in such a case the entry of the curat merely claims that if anything is done to set up the will, the lady shall have notice of it. (The proceedings are instituted afterwards.) The curat only says in effect "Let me know what ~~is~~ done." The person entering it can only be a defendant, and it is difficult to contend that a defendant has instituted proceedings. In this case it is very difficult for the lady claimed the goods as heiress, and gave notice to the high bailiff that they were hers—p. 855.

STIRLING, J. (after discussing Holmes v. Blogg, Taylor, Ex parte and Corpe v. Overton) continued. It is to be observed that all the learned judges [in Corpe v. Overton] who deal with the case, distinguish it from Holmes v. Blogg, on the ground that there had been actual enjoyment of the demised premises in Holmes v. Blogg. They did not say that the mere demise itself in default of occupation would have been sufficient, and it seems to me that the true rule to be drawn from the cases is to consider whether the infant has derived any advantage under the contract. In the present case there was no advantage to the infant. She took no part in the management of the company, and did not attend any meetings. The only advantage she has had is the allotment of shares, and the fact of having her name placed on the register. It seems to me that that is not an advantage within the rule of Corpe v. Overton —p. 796.

LOPES, J.—In this particular case evidence as to the amount of clothes the defendant possessed at the time when the order relied on was given was admissible, and the jury should have been told that in arriving at a conclusion whether the goods supplied by the plaintiffs were necessary or not, they should consider whether the defendant was already sufficiently supplied. Against this view the authority of Ryder v. Wombwell has been cited, and it has been suggested that this Court is bound by the decision in that case, being that of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and also the last decision on the point. I agree, however, entirely with my brother Field, that, looking at the conflict of authority, and the fact that the judges who reviewed that case in the Exchequer Chamber carefully, as it seems to me, kept open the point now raised, it is open to us to use our own judgment. Under these circumstances I think that we ought to act upon the decision in Foster v. Radgrave (supra, col. 1294), and the long chain of authorities on which it was founded —p. 414.

JAMES, L.J.—According to my own view an infant may be an agent. An infant may be the donee of a power of attorney. Hearle v. Greenbank, which is the only decision on the subject, no doubt decided that an infant could not exercise a power over real estate; but the judgment was expressly and carefully limited to real estate, and is—if not an implication that it was otherwise as to personal estate and probably otherwise as to gavelkind estates in Kent—at least no authority to the contrary.—p. 246.

LINDLEY, J.—Coxhead v. Mullis. must be taken as binding on us—p. 689.

DENMAN, J.—It was decided by this Court in Coxhead v. Mullis that sect. 2 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1871 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62) applies to actions for breach of promise of marriage. By that decision I am bound. That case further decided that, where there has been an express promise of marriage during the infancy of a defendant, and the only evidence subsequently is evidence of mere conduct on the part of the engaged couple, consisting of their treating one another as an engaged couple and keeping company as such, without any evidence of words capable of being construed as a fresh promise, such conduct must be referred to the promise made during the infancy of the defendant, and held to be mere evidence of ratification within the meaning of the above clause. But it has also been held in Northcote v. Doughty, by which I am also bound, that where there is evidence not only that after the defendant's coming of age the defendant and the plaintiff behaved as before, but that the defendant used language capable of being considered as a fresh promise, it is for the jury to find whether the words so used amount merely to evidence of a ratification of the promise made during infancy, or whether they prove a fresh promise—p. 691.

CONFERENCES, C. J. (dissenting).—In Coxhead v. Mullis, my brother Lopes and I held that the Infants' Relief Act applied to the contract of marriage. That case has never been overruled; but in the later case of Northcote v. Doughty, and again in his judgment in the present case, my brother Denman does not concur in opinion that it was not well decided. It is true that my brother Lindley accepts the case, and in a sense so does my brother Denman; but if it is not law, the sooner it is overruled the better, and, as the only judgment actually pronounced in it is mine, I ought, if on consideration I think it wrong, to say so, and to give every facility for having it reviewed in the C. A. If it is not law, there is a short and summary end to the case before us, because I do not question that, but for 37 & 38 Vict. c. 62, the verdict in this case ought to be entered for the plaintiff—p. 692.

ESHER, M. R.—In a case like this I am of opinion that the right question for the jury, if there is evidence in support of it, is the question stated by Lopes, L. J. in Northcote v. Doughty (supra)—viz., did the defendant intend to make a new absolute promise or merely to re-affirm the old promise? I wish to add that the only question of law decided in Ditcham v. Worrall was that there was evidence to go to the jury—ib. LINDLEY and LOPES, L. JJs. concurred.

KEKEWICH, J.—Chubb v. Griffiths is not very satisfactory, as the record has been looked at by the registrar, and notwithstanding that the decree bears on the face of it the name of a most careful registrar, it does not appear from the documents that the defendant was an infant, still less that a guardian ad litem was defending. Mr. Archibald Smith appeared as counsel "for the infant," according to the report, and urged that it was "not a case for costs as against an infant." The judgment also is a little puzzling, because the M. R. says: "In such a case, I am of opinion, upon the principle laid down in Cory v. Gerteken (supra), that infancy cannot protect him from paying the costs of this suit." . . . I do not find that the case helps me much. It does not give the principle on which the defendant had to pay the costs, so that if I only had Chubb v. Griffiths to go upon, I might hesitate to order the payment in the present case. . . . No doubt the question argued there [Lemprière v. Lange] was a question of fraud. It was an action against an infant who had obtained the lease of a furnished house by representing that he was of full age. The main point decided was this. It was held that the lease must be declared void and possession given up, and the defendant restrained by injunction from parting with the furniture, but that he was not liable for use and occupation. . . . Cory v. Gerteken, which was cited in Chubb v. Griffiths, was also cited in Lemprière v. Lange. When the M. R. eventually gave judgment on the main point, he said that the injunction must go, and "the defendant must pay the costs of the action." . . . In Jones, Ex parte, Jones, In re (supra), Chubb v. Griffiths was referred to by Sir G. Jessel, and he remarks that it was a case of tort. He does not take that opportunity of saying that the defendant did not appear, or ought not to have been held liable to pay costs. That, however, does not go very far; but it shows that the case was at least brought under his attention, so that he had the opportunity of correcting it if he considered that it was wrong. Lemprière v. Lange is mentioned in Seton on Judgments (5th ed.), pp. 837 and 1028, but it does not give the form of the order as to payment of costs. 1 am also told that Chubb v Griffiths has been referred to in several of the text books on practice.

KAY, J.—Now, De Pereda v De Mancha—the reasoning of which, I confess, I have some difficulty in following—certainly makes it very difficult for me to say that, if the infant were a British subject, she would not be a ward of Court. The only distinction between that case and the present is that in the former the fund was standing to an account the title of which included the name of the infant, and therefore it was practically standing in the infant's name. Here it is standing to an account which includes the class of which the infant is one, but does not mention her name. However, looking at the decision in De Pereda v De Mancha, I am afraid that I could not, if there were the case of a British subject, say that there is any essential difference between the two cases, because the reasoning of that decision, as I understand it, is this. If there be a fund in Court under its administration standing to the account of an infant, or to an account under which an infant is entitled, then, inasmuch as the Court is bound to administer that fund, the infant will be treated as a ward of Court to the same extent as an infant who is a party to an action for the administration of property belonging to that infant. Undoubtedly we use the words "ward of Court" in such a case in rather a special sense. Without at all intimating any opinion that De Pereda v De Mancha has been wrongly decided (which, of course, I should not venture to say), it seems to me very doubtful whether, even if rightly decided, it could be intended to include a case like this. In this case the money paid into Court was a mere legacy, the infant was not a party, and would not have been properly a party to the action under which the money was paid in, even under the old practice. The money was only paid in because it was subject to a trust for one for life with remainder over, and it was not at the moment distributable. I should hesitate very long before I held that that made an infant, who was entitled in reversion to a share of that money, a ward of Court.—pp 370, 371.

JESSE, M.R. said a bill in equity might be filed by an infant to recover land under a legal title. That was established by many early cases, and though there was a recent decision to the contrary, Crowther v. Crowther, the earlier authorities were not cited in that case, and it was in fact an erroneous decision. The law was laid down correctly by Wyllie v. Ellice, and the authorities cited in *Boddy v. CRAWFORTH, L.C., was not prepared to say that, in his opinion, the judgment of Lord Cottonham was wrong in Evans, in re; but that case was different from the present, inasmuch as the estate of the pensioners might at any time be defeated by the birth of a brother. They had not an indefeasible estate, and did not represent the whole fee, but that could not be so here, because in any event the whole fee simple was before the Court.—p 315.

LORD HERSHELL.—That case [Buckinghamshire (Earl) v. Drury] has given rise to a great deal of criticism since the time when the decision in it was pronounced, and much disapproval has been expressed of it. I do not think it necessary to say much with regard to it, for this reason. That case decides this, and this alone, that it was competent for an infant, by means of a marriage settlement, to bar his right to obtain by virtue of the marriage an interest in her husband's property, and in the opinion expressed by Lord Mansfield he distinctly says, "I approve the distinction taken by Wilmot, J. between infants contracting for conveying away something of their own and barring themselves of a right which is a third person's." It is quite unnecessary to inquire whether that distinction is one which can be supported by reasoning or not. It is sufficient to say that, whatever be the validity of the decision in that case, it cannot be relied upon as an authority beyond this, that in certain cases an infant may deprive herself of rights which she would otherwise have possessed in the property of her husband. . . In Sampson and Wall, In re, the majority of the C. A. came to the conclusion that those words ["It shall be lawful for every infant upon or in contemplation of his or her marriage"] ought to be construed so as to include a post-nuptial as well as an ante-nuptial settlement, if the post-nuptial settlement was made on the occasion of the marriage, so as to be connected with that event. I do not propose to express any opinion with regard to that decision one way or another. It is unnecessary, in the view which I take, to do so. But certainly those who pronounced the decision do not appear to have contemplated as a logical consequence of it that which the learned counsel for the appellants have contended does logically follow—namely, that the statute not only applies to post-nuptial as well as to ante-nuptial settlements, but, because it applies to them, indicates an intention that an infant, though married, should have the full powers which the statute confers.—p. 664.

Blockley, In re, Blockley v Blockley (1885) 51 L. J. Ch. 722, 39 Ch. D. 250, 33 W. R. 777, PEARSON, J.—Mr. Cookson has argued that an advancement by a father to a son to enable him to pay his debts is under no circumstances an advancement by potition within the statute, and is relied upon what was said by Jessel, M.R. in Taylor v Taylor. With all deference to the M.R. I cannot agree in his views. I think that a sum of money given by a father to his son to pay his debts is, or may be, an advancement, as much as a sum of money given him for any other purpose. In Boyd v Boyd, Wood, V.C. said, "Wherever a sum is paid for a particular purpose, which is thought good and right by the father, and which the son himself desires, if it be money which is drawn out in considerable amount, and not a small sum, it must be treated as an advance. The payment of the money is the important thing—the Court does not look to the application. As to the debt, suppose the young man had represented to his father that it was extremely important they should be paid, in order that he might keep his position in the army, and the father had paid these sums in order to assist him, it would have been clearly an advance." I cannot conceive stronger language than that. In my opinion, if a sum of money is paid by a father for the benefit of his son, it is an "advancement by potition"—p. 723

JESSEL, M.R.—In Sayre v Hughes the V.C. says thus: "It has been argued that a mother is not a person bound to make an advancement to her child, and that a widowed mother is not a person standing in such a relation to her child as to raise a presumption that in a transaction of this kind a benefit was intended for the child. But the case of a stranger who stands in loco parentis seems not so strong as that of a mother."

That is not the question, there is no rule upon the point of strength, but the question is one of equitable obligation. Then the V.C. proceeds: "In De Vissem, In re, it was said that a mother does not stand in such a relationship to a child as to raise a presumption of benefit for the child. The question in that case arose on a petition in lunacy, and it seems to have been taken for granted that no presumption of benefit arises in the case of a mother. But maternal affection, as a motive of bounty, is, perhaps, the strongest of all, although the duty is not so strong as in the case of a father, inasmuch as it is the duty of a father to advance his child. That, however, is a moral obligation, not a legal one." That is quite quite right. It is a moral obligation known to Courts of equity. All the C.A. decided was that there was no such moral obligation in the case of a mother as the Court could take notice of as such. That being so, the argument of the V.C. falls to the ground. The only question in such cases is whether the presumption is a presumption of law. I may say I should have no hesitation in deciding Sayre v Hughes in the same way as the V.C. did, having regard to the evidence; though I should not have arrived at the same conclusion irrespective of the evidence—p. 179.

That [Kirk v Eddowes] is a distinct decision which has been followed in numerous cases since. It shows that, where a transaction between a father and son took place after the date of the will, parcel evidence of the father's intention was admissible, not as the evidence of revocation or alteration of any part of the will, but as evidence of an independent transaction, whereby the legatee received a portion of his legacy by anticipation.—p. 380.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have every wish to give effect to an arrangement which would provide maintenance for the infants, but we cannot see our way to making an order for that purpose. We hoped at first that Howarth, In re, might help us. In that case the Court charged the expenses of the past maintenance of an infant on the corpus of an estate to which he was entitled in fee simple in possession. This was done on the principle that any one who maintained the infant could obtain a judgment against him which would charge his real estate, and that the order made substantially came to the same thing. We thought at first that by a subtle application of the same principle we could find a way of creating a charge in the present case. But we cannot make an order having a wider effect than a judgment at law against the infant would have. Now, though an action could be brought for necessities supplied to the infants, no actions would lie against them for the premiums on the policy of insurance, and those premiums form a part of the sum which it is sought to charge. This objection appears to me to be fatal—p. 294. RAY, L.J.—In addition to what Lindley, L.J. has noticed, there is another objection. The theory is that the charge could be enforced against the estate of the child who first becomes entitled in possession. But the amount of his liability in the supposed action would be very different from the 18,600*l.* which it is now sought to charge. He would be liable only for what had been expended for his own maintenance. The principle of Howarth, In re, therefore, does not cover the case Ring v. Jarman, the orders in which have been furnished to us, does not appear to me to help the application.—p. 295.

Cadman v. Cadman (1886) 55 L. J. Ch. 833; 33 Ch. D. 397, 55 L. T. 569; 35 W. R. 1.—CA. COTTON, L.J.—In that case [Howarth, In re] the estate was an estate in possession, and the whole foundation of that case fails unless there is an estate in possession. . . I must not be considered as acceding to the views which the judges took in that case. I do not see what authority the Court had in that case, and I do not see what authority the Court would have in this case, if there were a claim on the part of the mother here, to make such an order as was there made effectually to charge the freehold estates.—p. 834.

LOPES, L.J.—Speaking for myself. I do not think I could have arrived at the conclusion arrived at in that case. But assuming that to be good law, there is a vast distinction between that and the present case. In Zouarth, In re, the infant was entitled to a fee simple in possession. There was only one infant, the application was in respect of past maintenance, and the Court thought that, inasmuch as an action might be brought against the infant for necessaries, the Court might charge the property for maintenance.

Here the estate is an entailed estate, here there are five infants, the oldest of whom is tenant in tail, who, if he attains twenty-one, on the death of the protector of the settlement can bar the estate and become absolutely entitled.—p 835

Fendall v. Nash, questioned.
Ernst v. Barlow (1807) 14 Ves 202; 9 R.R. 273 RESON, L.C.—That case [Cavendish v. Mercer] therefore is an authority only, that, where the Court sees that it is for the benefit of the infants, the chance of surviving being equal, and can procure the consent of all persons interested, the Court will take the chance of controverting the will. I cannot bring myself to think that case [Fendall v. Nash] properly decided; as upon certain contingencies both the principal and the interest would have gone to individuals who, not only did not, but could not, consent, not being then in existence. In the event of the death of a child under the age of twenty-one, leaving issue, the accumulated property would have gone to that issue; and how the Court could give to the infants that property, which in that event would belong to others, I cannot conceive.—p 203

KAY, J.—Sect. 48 of the Act of 1881 was intended to replace a provision in Lord Cranworth's Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 26), which has been repealed by sect. 71 of the Act of 1881. Lord Cranworth's Act only enabled trustees to apply for maintenance the income to which the infant "may be entitled in respect of such property," and it was decided by the O. A. in George, In re, that in the case of a contingent legacy which did not carry interest, the income of a fund paid into Court to the contingent legacy account could not be so applied, because even if he attained twenty-one the legatee would not become entitled to any of the intermediate income. The decision was in 1877, and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act was passed in 1881. In Whitetholme and Turner's Trusts (2nd ed., p. 86; 3rd ed., p. 93), it is stated in a note that this section (48) "is so worded as to avoid the question raised in 'George, In re.' In the same note the learned editors say that 'if no interest is payable on the legacy till the infant attains twenty-one, there is no income to which the section can apply, and the residuary legatee takes the income of the residue without deduction till the legacy becomes vested. The short effect of the section seems capable of being stated thus: Where the income will go along with the capital if and when the capital vests, then the income is applicable under the section for the benefit of the infant, otherwise not.' But if that is the effect of the Act it does not avoid the question raised in George, In re. The precise question in George, In re, was whether Lord Cranworth's Act applied to income to which the infant never could become entitled, and if the Act of 1881 was passed to avoid the effect of George, In re, the intention must have been to enable the trustees to maintain the infant out of income of a contingent legacy, which income at first the Act would belong to someone else and not to the infant even though he should attain twenty-one. I have communicated with Mr. Wolstenholme, who tells me, and allows me to state, that the note in question is erroneous. The reference should have been to Cotton's Trusts, In re. In that case the income of the legacy would belong to the legatee if he attained twenty-one, and the question was whether Lord Cranworth's Act applied to such income, or was only applicable to income actually vested in the infant. The Court said that the more apt expression would have been "may become" than "may be," yet held the Act applicable. Now the difficulty is, first, that there was no necessity after that decision to alter the language of the statute to make it applicable to income of that kind, and secondly, if altered for that purpose, the proper alteration would have been to make that phrase "may be or become," as suggested in that judgment. But the law was altered after that case, and after George, In re, by striking out altogether any reference to the title of the infant to the income, and dealing with the income of any property to which he is contingently entitled, as it would seem, prout facie, to whomsoever such income may belong.—p 295.

BUCKLEY, J.—The decision of Fry, J. in Buckley's Estate, In re, decided upon sect. 26 of Lord Cranworth's Act, is only that that Act applied to gifts absolute or contingent, and not to gifts vested liable to be divested. The decision of North J. in Wells, In re, is that a person entitled to a vested interest for life is, on attaining twenty-one, the person ultimately entitled to the property within sub-sect. 2 [of sect. 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881]. North, J., I think, thought as I do, that "property" means the income whose accumulations are being dealt with. The C.A. in Humphreys, In re, was again dealing with an immediate vested life interest. That decision approved Wells, In re, and, while I feel some difficulty by reason of the fact that the decision was rested upon finding in the will an expression of a contrary intention, within sub-sect. 3 of sect. 43, I do not think there is anything in it to preclude me from coming to the conclusion that "property" in sub-sect. 2 means that property whose accumulation has produced the fund. The Court in Humphreys, In re, left open the point which I have now to decide.—P. 478

JESSEL, M.R.—It is said that this is a contract with the father as part of the settlement, and that it has been so decided in Mundy v. Howe (Earl). The decision referred to went a step further. It laid down that it was not only a contract with the father, but it was a contract which entitled the father to get rid of the rule of equity which said that a power or trust for the maintenance of the infants was to be exercised and used with a view to the benefit of the infants, and not for the benefit of the father; and therefore, if the father were able to maintain the children, it was not intended to relieve him from the liability so to do. That was held no doubt in the first case under a will; the benefit that the testator meant was a benefit to the child on principle. But it is difficult to see how the construction of a marriage settlement can be different from that of a will. That decision has been commented on several times, notably by Kindersley, V.-C. in Ransome v. Burgess, and by Malins, V.-C. in Kervison's Trusts, In re, and I think their criticisms are well founded. On the other hand, considering the number of times Mundy v. Howe (Earl) has been recognised in this Court, it is quite impossible now for this Court to say that that case is not law and not binding upon it. But it does appear to me, having regard to the dissatisfaction of so many judges, and considering the effect of that decision, that it is not part of our duty to carry it any further. In Ransome v. Burgess, as appears from the report, both in the authorised reports and in the Law Journal, this point was not argued, and was not decided by the judge, and, indeed, when he sums up the case, he states it thus (on p. 780): "If the language of the settlement is so framed as to express a trust to apply the income or any part of the income in maintaining the children, although the quantum of income to be so applied is left to the discretion of the trustees, the father is entitled to have whatever is proper and necessary for the maintenance of his children applied for that purpose without reference to his ability to maintain them, but if the language of the settlement expresses merely a power so to apply the income or any part thereof to the maintenance of the children, then the father is not so entitled." So that, as he states it, he takes it to be clear in the case before him that it was a trust, as he had already stated in a former part of his judgment, exactly like the case of Mundy v. Howe (Earl). Having, therefore, regard to this point having escaped notice, and to the decision of the Court, and having regard to the other points which I have mentioned, I think we are not bound to follow the decision in Ransome v. Burgess, and that decision is not supported by the authority of Mundy v. Howe (Earl), and is not supported by any independent principle—pp. 524, 525.

LINDLEY, J.—Then when you come to the case before Kindersley, V.-C. (Ransome v. Burgess), I confess I am unable to distinguish that case from the present. But then he did this, he extended, and in my opinion erroneously extended, the previous decisions. Taking the principles correctly, he put a construction on the clause which I confess I do not think the word warranted, and I decline to be a party to extending the rule he followed—p. 528. Miller v. Blankley (1878) 38 L. T. 527.

GROVE, J.—Of the Chancery cases cited the strongest in favour of the defendant is the second of the two bankruptcy cases I have mentioned, viz., Lynch, Ex parte, Lynch, In re [(1876) 15 L. J. Bk. 48, 2 Ch. D. 227. See "BANKRUPTCY," col. 97]. In that case the facts were, that an infant trader gave two acceptances in respect of money due for goods sold and delivered to him, which were dishonoured. After he came of age the creditors in respect of such goods presented a bankruptcy petition against him, the act of bankruptcy alleged being, that he had, a fortnight before he came of age, filed a liquidation petition under which the creditors had failed to come to any resolution. And it was held that the petitioning creditors were entitled to an adjudication of bankruptcy. I am far from saying that this case is not distinguishable from the one we are deciding. But both the County Court judge, and the chief judge on appeal, decided on the ground which is based here, that if an infant has been held out and dealt with as a trader, he can be made a bankrupt in respect of a trade debt, although they also decided on another ground. We cannot, however, upon the authority of that case come to a decision wholly different from that arrived at in Bartlett v. Wells and De Roo v. Foster. No case has been cited which goes the length of saying that, to an action in respect of a debt contracted in the course of trading during infancy, the defence of infancy cannot be set up. All the Chancery authorities cannot be reconciled because Stikeman v. Dawson is an authority for deciding as we are doing. That case was a stronger one against the infant than this, in that the party dealt with him under the supposition that he was of full age, which is not stated in the plaintiff's evidence in this case. Yet there it was held that a man cannot be charged, after his majority, in respect of his dealings during his minority, merely because the other party, in consequence of such dealing, believed he was not a minor.

COTTON, L.C.—There is no case in point except Hind v. Whitmore, in which there is an expression of opinion by Wood, V.-C., that the rule ought not to be extended to such a case as we have before us. But a married woman stands now on a different footing from that on which she stood at that time. She can sue without a next friend by leave of the Court under Ord. XVI. r. 8, with or without security for costs, as the Court may direct. Therefore it cannot be said that she is prevented from suing because she cannot find a next friend. We must, therefore, lay down the rule that a married woman cannot be allowed to bring a fresh action till the costs of the former suit are paid. She must take care to select a next friend who is a responsible person.—p. 290.

The dismissal of the appeal in Furtado v. Furtado depended, therefore, on the peculiar circumstances of the case, and did not set aside the general rule.—ib.

Dawson v. Jay (1854) 3 De G. M. & G. 764.—CRANWORTH, L.C.; and Johnstone v. Beattie (1843) 10 Cl. & F. 424; 7 Jur. 1023.—H.L. (E.). LYNDHURST, L.C., LORDS COTTENHAM and LANGDALE, LORDS BROUGHAM and CAMPBELL dissenting (see judgments at length); affirming 8 C. non Beattie v. Johnstone (1841) 10 B. C. 300, 1 Ph. 17.—LYNDHURST, L.C., explained.

Stuart v. Stuart (or Moore), or Stuart v. Bute (Marquis) (1861) 4 Macq. H. L. 1; 9 H. L. Cas. 440; 7 Jur. (N.S.) 1129, 4 L. T. 382, 9 W. R. 356, 722.—H.L. (SC.), affirming 8 C. non Bute (Marquis) v. Stuart, 2 Giff. 582.—STUART, V.-C. CAMPBELL, L.C.—I must use the freedom to observe, that whatever opinion the Scotch judges may justly form of the decision of this House in Johnstone v. Beattie, they would have acted with more dignity and more magnanimously as well as more judicially, if they had calmly and promptly considered what was for the benefit of the infant, and had recollected that a Court may not only be consumed for exceeding its jurisdiction, but for declining to exercise its jurisdiction for the relief of a suitor, from the apprehension that in another cause its jurisdiction has been unjustifiably encroached upon by another Court. I can take upon myself to say, that Johnstone v. Beattie, whether properly or improperly decided, is no authority whatever for the interlocutor . . . appealed against . . . There is only one other case which I think I am called upon to notice—Dawson v. Jay, before Cranworth, L.C. As at first stated at the bar, it certainly seemed closely in point, and it alarmed me much, for we were told that an American infant, who had a guardian regularly appointed by the Supreme Court at New York, having been fraudulently brought to England against the will of the guardian, Lord Cranworth had refused to interfere, and would not order the infant to be delivered up to the injured guardian. But the case being examined, it turns out that the infant came to England with the entire concurrence of the guardian originally appointed, who continued guardian at the time of the removal, and that it was another guardian, afterwards appointed, with doubtful regularity, who wished to get possession of the infant, and carry her back to America after she had been living several years in England. It further appeared that she was a British subject, although born in America, and the L.C. was thus called upon, without any offence being imputed to her, to sentence her to transportation to America by the decree of a Court of Equity.—pp. 63, 64.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I would make a passing observation upon Johnstone v. Beattie. Perhaps it might have been a decision more consonant with the principles of general law to have held there that every country would recognise the status of guardian in the same way as they would undoubtedly recognise the status of parent or the status of husband and wife. But supposing that not to have been the view taken by the House, then there is nothing in that decision of Johnstone v. Beattie, that could have been decided otherwise, or that could at all interfere with or touch the present question, for all that was decided there was, that the status of guardian not being a status recognised by the law of this country unless constituted in the country, it was not a matter of course to appoint a foreign guardian to be English guardian, but was only a matter to be taken into consideration. That was all that was decided in that case.—p. 67. LORDS WENSLEYDALE, CHILMSFORD and KINGSDOWN concurred.

- FAIRWELL, J.—The principles on which the Court acts in cases of this class are well settled. First, the father's religion is prima facie, the infant's religion—religio sequitur patrem—and the guardian's duty is to see that the ward is brought up in that religion, and is safeguarded against disturbing influences by any one holding the tenets of a different faith—Newbery, In re, and Besant, In re. Secondly, the Court, in considering the question of guardianship has regard before all things to the infant's welfare. It has regard, of course, to the rights of the father and mother, but the essential requirements of the infant are paramount—Christie, In re (supra, col. 1317). Thirdly, it is by no means in cases of misconduct only that the Court interferes to remove a guardian. Thus, in X. In re, X. v. Y., which was cited as an authority in favour of the guardian, which really has no application, the "A" held on the facts that there was nothing calculated to prejudice the infant in that case—p. 116.

- SELWYN, L.J.—At some future period of this case, upon a motion, as in Hills v. Croll, or at the hearing of the cause, circumstances may be shown which render it improper for the Court to interfere; it may be shown either that the plaintiff has placed himself in such a situation that he ought not to be allowed to exercise his right, or that the defendant had not notice of the covenant when he purchased the property, and then possibly Hills v. Croll may have some application, though, in my opinion, it is very difficult to reconcile that case with Lumley v. Wagner, which has been repeatedly followed, and if Hills v. Croll is to stand with that case at all, it can only be upon its particular circumstances — (p. 660)

GIPFARD, J. — With respect to Hills v. Croll, that case, as was said by Lord St. Leonards in his judgment in Lumley v. Wagner, was decided according to its particular circumstances. Unless it is to be taken as laying down that the Court is to refuse to act on a negative covenant wherever there is a correlative obligation which it cannot enforce, it does not apply, if it is taken as going that length, it is contrary to Lumley v. Wagner, and must be considered as overruled — (p. 662).

Wolverhampton and Walsall Ry. v. L. & N. W. Ry. (1873) L. R. 16 Eq. 133, 43 L. J. Ch. 131. SELBORNE, J.C. (for ROMILLY, M.R.). — With regard to Lumley v. Wagner, to which reference was made, really when it comes to be examined it is not a case which tends in any way to limit the ordinary jurisdiction of this Court to do justice between parties by way of injunction. It was sought in that case to enlarge the jurisdiction on a highly artificial and technical ground, and to extend it to an ordinary case of breach and service, which is not properly a case of specific performance. The technical distinction being made that "I will not do a thing" is the agreement — "I will," even although the negative term might have been implied from the positive, yet the Court, refusing to act on an implication of the negative, will act on the expression of it. I can only say that I should think it the safer and the better rule, if it should eventually be adopted by this Court, to look in all such cases to the substance and not to the form. If the substance of the agreement is such that it would be violated by doing the thing sought to be prevented, then the question will arise, whether this is the Court to come to for a remedy. If it is, I cannot think that ought to depend on the use of a negative rather than an affirmative form of expression. If, on the other hand, the substance of the thing is such that the remedy ought to be sought elsewhere, then I do not think the form ought to be changed by the use of a negative rather than an affirmative. — (p. 140.)

PRY, J. — It appears to me that the tendency of recent decisions, and especially Endergill v. Houndland and Wolverhampton and Walsall Ry. v. L. & N. W. Ry. is towards this view — that the Court ought to look at what is the nature of the contract between the parties, that if the contract as a whole is the subject of equitable jurisdiction, then an injunction may be granted in support of the contract whether it contain or does not contain a negative stipulation, but that if, on the other hand, the breach of the contract is properly satisfied by damages, then that the Court ought not to interfere whether there be or be not the negative stipulation. That, I say, appears to me to be the point towards which the authorities are tending, and I cannot help saying that in my judgment that would furnish a proper line by which to divide the cases. But the question which I have to determine is not whether that ought to be the way in which the line should be laid down, but whether it has been so laid down by the authorities which are binding on me — (p. 837. WILLS, J. — It is certainly true, as has been argued, that the Court will decline to interfere by injunction where the plaintiff fails to do that which he has promised to do as part of the contract. An instance of this is afforded by Frechter v. Montgomery. . . In that case the plaintiff was bound to give the defendant a reasonable opportunity of acting, and failed to do so.—p. 180.

WRIGHT, J.—The contract contains a negative stipulation which the plaintiff seeks to enforce by injunction. Until the decision in Donnell v. Bennett, the doctrine in accordance with which such stipulations were enforced by injunction was seriously interfered with by the supposed rule that, where there could be no device for specific performance of a contract on the one side, there ought to be no injunction on the other side; but since the decision in Donnell v. Bennett this view has been somewhat altered.—p. 182

ROMER, J.—In my opinion the injunction asked for by the notice of motion ought not to be granted. The application is based on clause 3 of the agreement between the parties, which contains a negative stipulation, and so far distinguishes this case from that of Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman. As the present M.R. stated in Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, cases where negative stipulations in contracts of service are enforced by the Court ought not to be extended, and are to be regarded as anomalies which it would be very dangerous to extend. To enforce such a general negative stipulation as I find here would be, in my opinion, a dangerous extension, for here the stipulation extends to business of any kind, while the negative stipulations enforced in the pro cases, such as Lumley v. Wagner, were confined to special services.—p. 320.

Kirk v. The Queen (1873) L. R. 14 Eq. 558. WICKENS, V.-C.—East Lancashire Ry. v. Hattersley, the only authority which was cited for it, seems, I agree with Sir Roundell Palmer, to have proceeded to some extent on the consent or submission of the parties. It is not at all clear to me that Wigram, V.-C., would or could have made any order on it, if the parties had stood on then extreme rights; and there was at least consent enough to make an appeal impossible. Moreover, it was a single case, and a part of the reasoning in the judgment was, I think, not unfavourably criticised by Sir Roundell Palmer. It was, no doubt, suggested by the Solicitor-General that this is a trespass in respect of which the Courts of law would, in the existing state of the law, grant an injunction in an action of trespass. The mere fact that it is a continuing trespass, in the sense in which this is a continuing trespass, seems to me in no way conclusive, and I should observe that the power of the Courts of law to grant an injunction in a case of this sort, is rather against than in favour of the supposition, that the Court of Chancery has the jurisdiction. Certainly I decline for the first time to hold that there is such a jurisdiction, though I entirely agree with the Solicitor-General that it would be very convenient, and that it would be very much better if the Court had it.—p. 570.

BRITT, L.J.—No case has, I think, gone beyond what my own views on the subject are, unless it be Aslett v. Southampton Corporation, where apparently an injunction was granted in a case in which no Court before the Judicature Act would have granted an injunction; but it is not a case in which before the Judicature Act no Court would have given any remedy, because obviously before that Act there was a remedy by a quo warranto. In Malmesbury Ry. v. Budd the M.R. issued an injunction, but it was on the ground that the arbitrator had been guilty of corruption. And in Beddo v. Beddo the M.R. also issued an injunction, but that was on the ground that the arbitrator had been guilty of misconduct, the misconduct in that case being that the arbitrator, after he had assumed his authority as arbitrator, had become indebted to one of the suitors without the knowledge of the other side. Now I will not enter upon the case of Hedley v. Bates (post, col. 1331), because it is one about which there has been considerable discussion, and it is one about which the M.R. himself has said that he did not think he had so expressed himself as to make what he intended as clear as almost all his judgments are. Therefore the only case which goes beyond my own personal inclination as to the construction of this section is Aslett v. Southampton Corporation, and I doubt whether that case is rightly decided, but it is not now necessary to determine this. It seems to me that the dicta of James and Thesiger, L.J.J. in Day v. Brownrigg (supra, col. 1827) and Gaskin v. Balls are quite sufficient if authority were wanted for what we are now deciding—p. 37.

WIGKINS, V.-C.—But for this case I should have considered it perfectly well settled that the Court of Chancery will not restrain by injunction the publication of a libel. What was said by Lord Ellenborough in Dabest v. Beresford (supra), "that the L.C. would grant an injunction against the exhibition of a libellous picture," has been expressly disavowed by Lord Campbell in Austria (Emperor) v. Day (supra), and is inconsistent with the dictum of Lord Eldon in Gee v. Pritchard (supra), with that of Lord Langdale in Clark v. Freeman (supra), and with that of Sir L. Shadwell in Martin v. Wright (supra), and, lastly, it seems to me inconsistent with what may be clearly discovered to have been Lord Cottenham's opinion in Fleming v. Newton ((1848) 1 H. L. Cas. 363), for which opinion, it may be observed, he gives very strong reasons.

Dixon v. Holden has introduced a rule which, if not contrary to the doctrine of these cases, affords at least a very material qualification of it. It was laid down in that case that the Court will restrain the publication of a libel where it affects property or the potentiality of acquiring property, at least where the potentiality of acquiring property is professional or commercial. It is not for me to say that the rule so laid down is erroneous; but I think it was wholly new, and that nothing whatever was said in Austria (Emperor) v. Day, or in any other case, except possibly in the peculiar and very different case of Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley (supra), which supports it in any way.

The only shadow of authority the other way is in Dixon v. Holden, decided by Malins, V.-C. in the year 1869. I say nothing about the decision in that particular case, and I do not mean to say that the decision is not capable of being maintained. It professes to proceed mainly upon a case of Routh v. Webster, because I observe that the V.-C. says (at p. 493), "Routh v. Webster is an authority going the whole length of what is asked here. In that case a joint stock company was established, having for its only object the carrying passengers by steamboat and omnibus at a cheap rate. The defendants, the provisional directors, had published prospectuses in which the name of the plaintiff was used without his authority as a trustee of the company. They also paid Morfey's into the bankers of the company to the plaintiff's accounts as trustee." That case appears, if I may say so, to have been quite rightly decided. The difficulties in which the plaintiff might have been placed, especially at the time when that case was decided, looking at what was supposed then to be the state of the law as to such undertakings, are obvious; and he was held entitled to restrain, not any libel, for there was no libel, but that improper and unauthorised use of his name. It was upon the authority of that case that Dixon v. Holden was professed to be decided, but the V.-C. went further, and said thus (at p. 492) "The business of a merchant is about the most valuable kind of property that he can well have. Here it is the source of his fortune, and, therefore, to be injured in his business is to be injured in his property. But I go further, and say, if it had only injured his reputation it is within the jurisdiction of this Court to stop the publication of a libel of this description, which goes to destroy his property or his reputation, which is his property, and, if possible, more valuable than other property. In this case I go on general principle, and I am fortified by authority. General principle is in favour of it, but authority is not wanting." And further on the V.-C. says (at p. 491). "In the decision I arrive at I beg to be understood as laying down, that this Court has jurisdiction to prevent the publication of any letter, advertisement, or other document, which, if permitted to go on, would have the effect of destroying the property of another person, whether that consists of tangible or intangible property, whether it consists of money or reputation." Now, in these opinions the V.-C. conceived that he was fortified by authority. The authorities cited are, Fleming v. Newton, which appears to me to be an authority exactly to the contrary. Routh v. Webster, which was an authority for preventing the improper use of a man's name against his will, Clark v. Freeman, where the injunction was refused, and where Lord Langdale said the Court would not interfere to prevent a libel, and the only other case mentioned, Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, decided by the V.-C. himself, upon which of course the learned judge must be taken to have expressed the same opinion as he expressed in Dixon v. Holden. I am unable to accede to these general propositions. They appear to me to be at variance with the settled practice and principles of this Court, and I cannot accept them as an authority for the present application.—p. 146. Per LORDS LOPES and DAVEY—Bonnard v. Perryman has established as a rule of practice that an interlocutory injunction restraining the publication of a libel until the trial of the action will not be granted except in cases where any jury would find that the matter complained of was libellous, or where, if they found otherwise, their verdict would be set aside as unreasonable.

Per LORD HALSBURY.—Bonnard v. Perryman cannot restrict the discretion to be exercised on the facts of each case as to whether it is "just and convenient," within sect. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to grant such an injunction.

JESSEL, M.R.—Where the legislature has pointed out a mode of proceeding before a magistrate it is not, as a general rule, for another Court to interfere to stop that proceeding by injunction. I refer to that more particularly because Hedley v. Bates, which I decided when sitting at the Rolls, was cited as an authority for the exercise of such a jurisdiction. In the first place, as I read Hedley v. Bates, it decided no such thing. In that case there was a manifest and admitted trespass, as will be seen by looking at pp. 499 and 500 of the report, and the Court, having to decide the question between the parties, went on to say that it was convenient to decide the other question—that is, whether or not the provisions of the Act of Parliament applied to the case in question. The magistrates there had no jurisdiction unless a certain notice was given, and the real question I had to decide was whether a valid notice had been given or could be given, and then it was said that that question must be decided by the magistrates when the case should come before them, which it must, and the answer was, "That may be so, but while the whole matter is before the Court in the first instance, and the Court has power to decide whether the magistrates had jurisdiction, it is much more convenient, instead of granting a prohibition, to grant an injunction between the same parties." But the whole doctrine which I laid down (as I thought clearly) in Hedley v. Bates, was depen-

JAMES, J.J.—In old times this Court might well have been asked to interfere with criminal proceedings taken against an officer of the Court for the purpose of harassing him, as he had no other sufficient protection. There is an old decision referred to in the note to Franchign v. Chikona (1819) (3 Swans 276, 280, n), that arresting and killing a sequestrator was not murder. At that time, therefore, the Court had cause to interfere with criminal proceedings, but the cause for so doing has now ceased. The authority proleptical to us [York Corporation v. Pilkington], is, as far as I know, the only case in which this Court has made such an order as we are now asked to make; and often that case is not exactly similar, because it appears that the same right would there have been tried in both Courts—p. 66 from me on the construction of the statute. The case as to an injunction is simply reported by saying that the appeal against the refusal of the injunction was dismissed with costs. In that case I explained, somewhat in the same way that I gave to-day, what the meaning of Hedley v. Bates was, and I refused the injunction in that case, because I said the Court is not seized of the case otherwise. It is a mere case of prohibition, and there is no reason for changing the mode of proceeding from prohibition to injunction, where you are not compelled to decide the question on other grounds between the same parties, and in that case having refused that injunction, that refusal was affirmed by the Court of Appeal—p. 196.

appealed from, and the L.J.J. thought it a right decision. With the exception of that case before Lord Hardwicke, there is no instance in which a Court of equity has interfered in criminal proceedings. I do not say that the Court might not interfere in a possible case, but as a general rule it will not. Then I come to the question whether there is any equity at all. Now I have been referred to Auckland (Lord) v. Westminster Local Board of Works, and, speaking with all deference to the eminent judges who decided it, it appears to me that sufficient attention was not paid to the real facts of that case. The L.J.J. dealt with the case as if the Westminster Board of Works had threatened to pull down what they had no right to pull down, and that being a wrongful act, they felt no doubt as to their jurisdiction to restrain it. If that had been the case here, I should, without that decision, have granted an injunction, just as in the case of a railway company exceeding its powers. But, on reading the report, that was not the real state of the case at all. The Westminster Board of Works had not threatened to pull down the houses, but to apply to a magistrate for an order to pull down, and such an order could not have been made except by a magistrate having jurisdiction to make it; so that the application was really to restrain the Board, not from pulling down—as both the L.J.J. treated it—but from applying to a magistrate for an order to pull down. Consequently the judgment in that case has, in fact, no real application to the present case. I cannot, therefore, treat that as a decision upon the question whether a Court of equity will restrain an application to a magistrate for an order to pull down, it decided a totally different point, and I therefore cannot consider it as an authority applicable to the present case—p. 467.

COTTON, L.J.—The late M.R. there expressed an opinion that there ought not to be an enquiry as to damages unless the plaintiff had been guilty of some default in obtaining the injunction. Probably he did not mean his remarks to apply to a case like this, where, if the injunction was improperly granted, it would not be because the judge made a mistake, but because the plaintiff's evidence was not true. But I am of opinion that his dictum is not well founded, and that the rule is, that whenever the undertaking is given, and the plaintiff ultimately fails on the merits, an inquiry as to damages will be granted unless there are special circumstances to the contrary.—p. 477.

NORTH, J.—Then the point was suggested by Mr. Bazalgette that at any rate, if the motion by the defendants to discharge the order in other respects was right, yet, inasmuch as it was only made on the day on which the order itself would expire (as a matter of fact it was the day before), the motion could not have served any useful purpose, and therefore the defendants ought to pay the costs of it. A case [Bolton v. London School Board] was referred to by Mr. Bazalgette, in which that course was followed, of dismissing with costs a motion to dissolve an order that died on the evening of the day on which the motion was made. To begin with, it appears to me that was not a case of moving to discharge a motion for irregularity. That seems to me to make a great difference between that case and this. Independently of that, even if I had taken the view that that case, so far as it went, was an authority in favour of the proposition for which Mr. Bazalgette cited it, it still would not have led to the result he suggests, because the order in this case contains not merely an injunction but also an undertaking by the plaintiff to abide by any order the Court might make as to damages.—p. 425

LINDLEY, L.J.—The appellants' counsel have argued very strenuously that there is no jurisdiction, and have based their contention upon a passage in Lord Eldon's judgment in Iverson v. Harris. That was a case of a prohibition, and Lord Eldon differed from a decision of the Court of Ex. in another case upon the question who was bound by a prohibition. He said "I have no conception that it is competent to this Court to hold a man bound by an injunction who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause. The old practice was that he must be brought into Court, so as according to the ancient laws and usages of the country to be made a subject of the writ." That strikes me as perfectly correct. Lord Eldon was addressing himself to the question who the persons were who were bound by an injunction, he was not referring to persons who assisted others in committing breaches of an injunction.—p. 271.

Clifford* I am satisfied that the V.-C., whose decision is there reported, must have been misunderstood in the passage referred to, because, as that passage stands, if I have read it correctly, it amounts to a dictum on this effect—that it is now settled by Bacon v. Jones that a party filing a bill for an injunction will not succeed at the hearing unless he has applied for it by interlocutory application. I am sure the V.-C. never laid down, or intended to lay down, any such proposition. It might have been that he expressed himself in general terms, equated hoc, with reference to the case before him, and it was assumed that he meant to lay down that as a general proposition; but I am satisfied he never meant to do so.—p. 721.

FOLLOCK, C.B. (for the Court).—Then, being, for those reasons, of opinion that the action will lie against the executors if it would have done so against the testator, it remains to consider whether the direction to the jury was correct. We think it was. The objection was that it assumed the defendants were liable if there was negligence in the plaintiff, and that therefore the defendants would be liable, though not only not negligent, but even diligent. But we think that is the law. It is true the expression in the forms in "fore" is, that the loss was "propter defectum" of the innkeeper, but we think the cases show that there is a defect in the innkeeper, whenever there is a loss not arising from the plaintiff's negligence, the act of God, or the Queen's enemies. The only case that points the other way is Dawson v. Gurney, as reported 5 Q. B. 161. According to the report, however, of that case in 7 Jur 1037, "there was no evidence of the manner in which the horse received the injury for which the action was brought." This may be the explanation of that case, for though damage happening to the horse from what occurred in the stable might be evidence of defectus or neglect, still if it was not shown how the damage arose, it was not even shown that it arose from what occurred in the stable. This would reconcile that case to the general current of authorities.—p. 277

A. L. SMITH, L. J.—I cannot do better than read the words of Lopes, L. J., in Gordon v. Silber, with which I thoroughly agree. "The innkeeper is under an obligation to keep the goods of a guest received into the inn safely and securely, and can be sued and made liable in damages if he fails to do so respectively. As a compensation for the burden thus imposed upon him the law has given him a lien upon the goods of the guest until he discharges the expenses of his lodging and food. If the guest has brought goods to the inn to which he has no title, this will not deprive the innkeeper of his lien, because he is obliged to receive the guest without inquiries as to his title." It has been argued that that principle does not apply if the property in the goods be not in the guest, but in his employer, and that fact be known to the innkeeper, and that Broadwood v. Granara has so decided. In my opinion that case does not so decide. There the piano was not brought as the luggage of the guest, or anything of that kind; but here all the sewing-machines were received as the luggage of the commercial traveler, which the innkeeper was bound to take in. The question of pledge has nothing to do with this case, and the only question is what is the custom of the realm? With knowledge we have not to deal, for there is no authority that the lien given by the law of the realm is abrogated if the innkeeper knew that the goods were not the property of his guest. Knowledge makes no difference, and if half the goods were the guest's, but all were brought as his luggage, the obligation of the innkeeper would be the same throughout.—p. 667.

LORD BLACKBURN.—There was a subsequent case, which has not been cited, which proceeded upon an error and has been since reversed (I mean Godsall v. Boldero), where a person had insured the life of Mr. Pitt, having no other interest in his life than as a creditor of Mr. Pitt, which gave him an interest, and the House of Commons voted out of pure grace and avour a large sum of money to pay Mr. Pitt's debts, and the executor paid this debt. The insurance company set up the defence that this was a contract of indemnity and that Mr. Pitt's debt having been paid there could not be a tight recovery against them. Lord Ellenborough, falling into a blunder which has been since corrected, thought that the contract of life insurance was a contract of indemnity, and accordingly held that that was a good defence on the part of the insurance company. I have been obliged by people connected with insurance companies and other people with whom I have been brought into contact in the course of my professional experience, that no sooner had that been done than here was such an outcry that every one said he would never insure with a company which was capable of doing such a shabby thing. Consequently the insurance company instantly paid the whole loss and the whole of the costs, and published everywhere that they had done so. Nevertheless Lord Ellenborough's decision stood until it was decided in the Ex. Ch. [Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Co, post] that that case went altogether upon a mistaken idea that a contract of life insurance was a contract of indemnity, whereas it was nothing of the kind. But if it had been a contract of indemnity, the part of Parliament to pay Mr. Pitt's debts would have prevented the man's sustaining any loss by the death of Mr. Pitt, and consequently the decision would have been right.—p. 340

Thomson v. Weems (1884) 9 App. Cas. 671.—H. L. (SC.).

LORD BLACKBURN.—Those whose business it is to insure lives calculate on the average rate of mortality, and charge a premium which on that ordinary average will prevent their being losers. There are some expressions used by the judges in the Court of Session in the case of Hutchison, which would seem to lay it down, at least when it is the party's own life that is assured, that it is illegal, or at least so absurd that no one would make such a contract, to engage that if the life is such that the risk is of the ordinary kind, the insurer shall be bound, but that if there is a disease tending to shorten life, such as to make it not the ordinary risk, the insurer shall not be bound, whether the assured knew it or not. I cannot agree to this, it seems to me a very reasonable stipulation on the part of the insurer, and that it is not at all absurd or improper on the part of the assured to assent to such being a term of the contract. It is seldom that a derangement of one important function can have gone so far as to amount to disease without some symptoms having developed themselves, but the insurers have a right if they please to take a warranty against such disease, whether latent or not, and it has very long been the course of business to insert a warranty to that effect.

In Duchett v. Williams, in 1834, it was held, on reasoning to my mind irresistible, that in a declaration substantially, as far as regards this point, the same as this, what was untrue, so as to have the effect of avoiding the insurance, was also untrue so as to cause the forfeiture of the premium. In Anderson v. Fitzgerald (post, col. 1859), Lord B. Levens points out very strongly that where such a consequence would follow from a warranty, before a contract is held to have the effect of a warranty, it is necessary to see that the language is such as to show that the assured as well as the insurer meant it, and that the language in the policy being that of the insurers, if there is any ambiguity it must be construed most strongly against them. But he never questioned that if there was a warranty, and it was not fulfilled, it avoided the policy. And with the exception of Hutchison's Case . . . I think that in every case in which moral guilt was thought an element in the question of true or untrue, it has always been on the ground that the contract was such as not sufficiently to show that there was an agreement on the part of the assured that there should be a warranty. In Parker's Case, I think there was very strong ground for saying that it was not shown that the assured contracted that her answers to a medical man selected by the company, who was to examine her alone and report to them confidentially the conclusion to which he came, were warranted to be accurate; the very object of the examination would be frustrated if the patient were not to answer frankly and without reserve to the questions she was asked.—p. 681

BACON, V.-C.—In Lea v. Hinton the defendant as surety and creditor effected an insurance for the purpose of indemnifying himself, and received a larger sum on the policy than was necessary for those purposes. It was there held that he was not entitled to retain more than was sufficient to repay him, and that the surplus belonged to the estate of the debtor against whom he had charged all that he had paid. In Drysdale v. Piggott a similar decision was made, although there all the premiums had been paid by the creditor who had insured, and notwithstanding that the debtor had refused to pay the premiums when required to do so, and Coutenay v. Wright is to the like effect. But, in all these cases the relation of debtor and creditor was indisputable, and the ground of the decisions was that the insurance being only to secure the debt the creditor had no interest after the debt was paid. . . . Gottlieb v. Cranch, often referred to, and, as I conceive, never questioned, explains and establishes the principles applicable to cases like the present. And although in the more recent case of Knox v. Turner, Stuart, V.-C. expressed considerable doubt as to the grounds upon which some of the preceding decisions had been arrived at, yet, feeling himself bound by those decisions, he dismissed the bill of a plaintiff who, under circumstances not distinguishable from the present, except that he had purchased an annuity which the grantee had protected by effecting an insurance, sought to compel the grantee to transfer to him the policy. The V.-C. in his judgment so expressed himself as to encourage an appeal, an appeal was brought, and, being heard before Lord Hatherley, was by him unhesitatingly dismissed. It must, I think, therefore be considered as fully established upon authority that a grant of an annuity like that in the present case is a transaction perfectly lawful and perfectly plain, that whatever be the right of re-purchase, no relation of debtor and creditor is thereby created; that the indemnity which the grantee thinks fit to make for himself does not constitute a security in which the grantor has any right or interest; and that the claim of the plaintiff to have the proceeds of the policy brought into the account as if the original plaintiff could have claimed any interest in it, wholly fails.—p. 769

 redemption, or an ultimate interest in the fund, not improving that fund by the performance of one condition without which he cannot get it, does not, in my opinion, by performing that condition create a charge in his own favour as against his mortgagee. I was referred to two cases which undoubtedly appear at first sight somewhat to support the contention. The cases are West v. Reid and Shearman v. British Empire Insurance Co. It is enough for me to say that in neither of these two cases does it appear to me that the point for which they were cited to me was the subject-matter of discussion and decision. In West v. Reid the point in controversy was abandoned at the bar. In Shearman
v. British Empire Insurance Co. an offer had been made, which was not withdrawn from, and upon which the M.R. acted. It is quite rare that he makes an observation there that it was misage, but, looking at his previous decision in Clack v. Holland (supra), I very much doubt whether his lordship meant to determine that question. Certainly that point does not appear to have been argued, the question for argument being whether a person who had made a salvage payment was entitled to the entirety of the fund; and an offer having been made to give the defendant the portion of the fund which represented the actual payment, and that offer apparently never having been withdrawn, the case was decided on that ground. These are authorities therefore which do not appear to me, to sustain the proposition for which they were cited—p. 829.

 These [Shearman v. British Empire Mutual Assurance Co. (supra)], undoubtedly, the M.R. gave to a bankrupt mortgagee credit for premiums paid after the bankruptcy, and a lien for the amount of the premiums, but for what reason does not appear at all in the report. All that the reporter has told us is this, that the M.R.
 said that the plaintiff, the mortgagee, was clearly entitled to the policy moneys, but that the premiums paid subsequently to the bankruptcy were in the nature of salvage moneys, and the plaintiff must repay them to the legal personal representative of the mortgagee with interest upon them. Fry, L.J., in Saunders v. Dunman (supra), has suggested, and I think it is highly probable that is the correct explanation, that the decision went on the ground that previously to the institution of the suit the plaintiff, the mortgagee of the policy, had offered to pay the legal person, representative a sum larger than the amount of the premiums with interest thereon at 1 per cent. That very probably is the ground of the decision. But if the M.R. meant to express an opinion that a person having no interest in a policy can, by payment of the premiums, acquire a lien on the policy, I am bound to say I differ from that view. The real explanation of the case (Gill v. Donovan), in my opinion, is not that permission was given to persons who paid these premiums without authority to claim a lien for the amount of the premiums either on the income or the capital, but that the only question was, whether payment was to be made to them immediately, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation. That restraint on anticipation would not have prevented the trustees from paying the premiums, and it did not prevent repayment to the mortgagees who paid them. The V.C. there (Lytton v. Witty) refused to apply the doctrine alleged by the respondents to be essentially applicable to these cases, that a person whose expenditure has saved the property has a lien.—pp 246, 247. BOWEN, L.J. concurred.

PRY, L.J. (who also concurred).—It appears that the expression "salvage moneys," so we are informed by one of the learned counsel for the appellant, and I dare say he is quite right, first occurs in the report of Tharp, In re, which was before Lord St. Leonards in 1852, where he seems to have used the expression as one familiar to the Irish Courts in certain cases. I certainly wish that the expression had remained on the other side of the Channel, where it seems to have arisen. I doubt whether any doctrine which is expressed by the word "salvage" applies to cases of this description.—p. 254

NOTEH, J.—I think that Fry, L.J. intended, in Leslie, In re, to lay down exhaustively the cases in which a person who pays a premium in respect of a policy of insurance will be entitled to a lien upon the proceeds of the policy, and that he meant to say that a trustee would not be entitled to a lien in any other case than that which he mentioned.—p. 23

COTTON, L.J.—What we have to consider, therefore, is this: whether there is anything to justify the finding of the M.R. that there was any default or neglect to pay the money by the defendant company. If there was not, then the principle on which interest should be granted—that is, by way of damages—fails. The M.R. followed his former decision in Crossley v. City of Glasgow Life Assurance Co., which he thought decided this case upon many points. There the facts were very simple. In that case he gave, as he has given here, the assurance office all their costs as between solicitor and client, and he did so on the ground that they were justified in declining to pay the money without the decree of the Court. In the present case, it has not been questioned before us that the decree of the Court below gives a complete exoneration or discharge to the assurance office. It must not be assumed that we decide that that is so. That question is not before us, but it may hereafter arise. The M.R. in both cases decided that the decree of the Court would be a complete indemnity to the assurance office, upon this ground, that, although there was no legal personal representative to give a discharge to the office, yet he had the power to dispense with the presence of the legal personal representative, and that his decree, made in the absence of the legal personal representative under that power, would be a good discharge to the office. That is, in fact, a decision that until the decree the office could not reasonably be called upon to pay.—p. 176.

COTTELL, J. — In Webster v. British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Co., no doubt, James, L.J. said he was a little surprised at the decree having been made in the absence of the legal personal representative. But when the facts of that case are looked at they show a good reason for that observation. There the amount of an insurance on the life of an insured had been limited over to an equitable mortgagee in the absence of a legal personal representative of the mortgagor, the sum payable on the policy being largely in excess of the mortgage debt. The effect was to pay to the creditor a large surplus which belonged to the insolvent's estate. I should in that case have felt the same doubt which James, L.J. felt. Certainly Cotton, L.J. went further, and appeared to doubt whether the order would give a complete discharge to the insurance company. I should have thought, if it had been necessary to decide the point, that the order would have given a complete discharge. At all events, those observations of the learned judges were only dicta, and do not throw any doubt on the jurisdiction of the Court in such a case as this — p. 537.

JESSEL, M.R. — In Hall, in re, Lord Hatherley, then V.-C., incorrectly, in my opinion, apprehended the effect of a policy of insurance. In that case an insurance company had paid in a sum of money under the Trustee Relief Act, and the V.-C. says, "that it had been held that a mere stakeholder could pay in a fund under the Trustee Relief Act, and therefore the company were justified in so doing." He does not mention the authority where it had been so held, but even if that were so, a debtor is not in the position of a mere stakeholder, even where the creditor has dealt with the debt so as to make two claims to it. He may interplead, and in that sense, in that way, and to that extent, may be described incorrectly as a stakeholder, but that is a peculiar case, and an ordinary debtor cannot be considered a stakeholder. But when I come to look at Hall, in re, I find it was not an ordinary policy, it was a family policy, and it seems to have been thought that there was something peculiar or special about the case. The matter came before Lord Romilly in United Kingdom Life Assurance Co., in re. What happened there has happened, according to my experience, very often. An eminent Queen's Counsel, now Baggallay, L.J., and Mr. Everett, were counsel for the petitioners, and Mr. Alderson was counsel for the respondents, the Aldersons, who brought in a claim. He took the point that they were not liable to pay the costs because the Trustee Relief Act did not apply. It was not the company who took the objection, but he took the objection to avoid the payment of costs, so that he was not in a very favourable position. Mr. Wickens, for the insurance company, as to the right to pay in under the Trustee Act, cited Hall, in re. Then the M.R. said, "that he concurred with Wood, V.-C., that mere stakeholders might pay money into Court under the Trustee Relief Act, though they might not, strictly speaking, be termed trustees." He ordered the costs of the company of and relating to the payment into Court, and of this application, as between solicitor and client, and the costs of the petitioners, to be paid by the respondents, the Aldersons. So that he agreed that they were not trustees. He said they were mere stakeholders, and he concurred with Wood, V.-C. He did not really, as far as I can see, give a judicial judgment on the matter. It was a case in which he was not very anxious to decide favourably to the objecting party, and he ordered the respondents to pay the costs, which they ought to have paid in any event. No doubt it might have required a bill to make them pay them. That is all by decided. As I understand, he thought they were not strictly trustees, but that the Act applied to a mere stakeholder though not a trustee. Then when the matter came before

Wood, V.-C., in Webb's Policy, In re, it came in this way: "There were some very important questions to be argued out between the parties. They did not object at all, it was principally desired to take the opinion of the Court, they all took the benefit of the payment into Court, they did not object to pay the costs of the company, but they did object to pay the costs as between solicitor and client, and that is how the question came to be decided. Mr. Wickens, for the assurance company, argued 'that the company were entitled to costs as between solicitor and client. In an interpleader suit no doubt the plaintiff was entitled to costs only as between party and party, but the intention of the framers of the Trustee Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, s. 1) was not to substitute a proceeding for an interpleader suit. It was rather to substitute a proceeding for a suit to administer a trust, and to relieve persons who held moneys belonging to others in their hands,' and he cited United Kingdom Life Assurance Co., In re. There Wood, V.-C. observed, 'I think the question was argued before me, and decided in a case of Hall, In re.' The argument on the other side was that the company were stakeholders, and were to have their costs as between party and party. The V.-C. consulted the M.R., the M.R. having relied upon him in Hall, In re, and what he says, is this:—'I observe that in United Kingdom Assurance Co., In re, where the M.R. had to determine upon the propriety of payment into Court by an insurance company of the proceeds of a policy, his lordship decided that a stakeholder of this description came within the designation in the Act of 'trustees, executors, administrators or other persons, having in their hands any moneys belonging to any trust,' and he appears to have given the company their costs, as between solicitor and client, without any argument.' Then, after saying that the M.R. agreed with him, he goes on: 'The object of the Act was to relieve not only trustees, executors, and administrators, but other persons having trust money in their hands, and to enable them to obtain a cheap and efficacious mode of having the rights of the parties settled. It is in every way desirable that this form of proceeding should be encouraged rather than otherwise.' He does not decide they are trustees although they have trust moneys, but he says, 'the M.R. has decided that it was desirable to encourage this form of proceeding,' and that is all. I may say neither judge, in fact, said there was a trust—pp. 81–87.

WILLES, J.—In Sillem v. Thornton the description in the policy was untrue. At the time of the execution of the policy the promises described as of two stones were, in fact, of three, therefore, whatever is said in Sillem v. Thornton as to a subsequent alteration making a policy void must have been extra-judicial.—p. 113.

WILLES, J.—In effect, there being no violation of the law, and no fraud in the insured, an increase of risk to the subject-matter of insurance, its identity remaining, though such increase of risk be caused by the assured, does not avoid the insurance. I may add, that there is a case of Sillem v. Thornton, which turned mainly upon a question of identity of the subject-matter intended to be assured, and which may be sustained on that ground, notwithstanding our present decision. That part of the judgment in that case which discusses the above point was not called for by the facts, and if it was intended to negative the proposition just stated,
 we ought to overrule it.—p. 445.

BRETT, L.J., in Bernard v. Rodocanachi (supra, col. 1343) the foundation of the judgment on my mind was that what was paid by the United States Government could not be considered as salvage, but must be deemed to have been only a gift. It was only a gift to which the assured had no right at any time until it was placed in their hands. Darrell v. Tibbitts seems to me to be entirely in favour of the plaintiff in this case. I shall not retract from the very terms which I used in that case. It seems to me that in Darrell v. Tibbitts the insurers were not subrogated to a right of action or to a remedy. They were not subrogated to a right to enforce the remedy, but what they were subrogated into was the right to receive the advantage of the remedy which had been applied, whether it had been enforced or voluntarily administered by the person who was bound to administer it.—p. 380—391.

• BOWEN, L.J., who also concurred, said: "We have been asked to hold that a tenant from year to year can always recover the full value of the house from the insurance company, although he has intended to insure only his limited interest in it. There is some justification for that in the language of James, L.J. in Rayner v. Preston. He says this: 'In my view of the case it is perhaps unnecessary to refer to the Act of Parliament as to fire insurance. But that Act seems to me to show that a policy of insurance on a house was considered by the legislature, as I believe it to be considered by the universal consensus of mankind, to be a policy for the benefit of all persons interested in the property, and it appears to me that a purchaser having an equitable interest under a contract of sale is a person having an interest in the house within the meaning of the Act. I believe that there is no case to be found in which the liability of the insurance office has been limited to the value of the interest of the insured in the house destroyed. If a tenant for life having insured his house has the house destroyed or damaged by fire, I have never heard it suggested that the insurance office could cut down his claim by showing that he was of extreme old age or suffering from a mortal disease.' Now, with the greatest possible respect and reverence for all that is left to us of the judgments of a great judge like James, L.J., I confess I do not follow that. . . . It is true that in most cases the claim of a tenant from year to year, or for years, cannot be answered by handing over to him what may be the marketable value of his property, and the reason is that he insures more than the marketable value of his property, and he loses more than the marketable value of his property; he loses the house in which he is living, and the beneficial enjoyment of the house as well as its pecuniary value. That, I think, is all that was meant by the V.-C. in Simpson v. Scottish Union Insurance Company—p. 399.

COLLINS, J.—A point was made upon behalf of the defendant, based upon a dictum of Cotton, L.J. in Darrell v. Tibbitts, which raised, I think, the only material difficulty in this case. His lordship said: "If the company had known of the covenants in the lease, and of the actual position of the parties, it might have been said that they had paid without requiring the covenant to be enforced, and therefore had lost their remedy." In the present case the plaintiffs, when they paid the insurance money to the defendant, were thoroughly aware of all his rights against his lessor. They had seen the lease, and their attention had been called to the covenant, and therefore it becomes necessary to consider whether that fact distinguishes the case from Darrell v. Tibbitts, and obliges the plaintiffs to renounce such rights as they might have retained had they chosen to insist upon them at the time they paid the money. Cotton, L.J., in a later case, makes observations which seem to be somewhat inconsistent, not with the decision, but with the suggestion which he apparently makes in the passage I have cited from Darrell v. Tibbitts. In . . . Castellain v. Preston, he says: "If the proposition is stated in that manner, it is clear that the office would be entitled to the benefit of anything received by the assured before the time when the policy is paid, and it is established by Darrell v. Tibbitts that the insurance company is entitled to that benefit whether or not before they pay the money they insist upon a calculation being made of what can be recovered in diminution of the loss by the assured, if they do not insist upon that calculation being made, and if it afterwards turns out that in consequence of something which ought to have been taken into account in estimating the loss, a sum of money or even a benefit, not being a sum of money, is received, then the office, notwithstanding the payment made, is entitled to say that the assured is to hold that for its benefit, and although it was not taken into account in ascertaining the sum which was paid, yet when it has been received it must be brought into account; and if it is not a sum of money, but a benefit that has been received, its value must be estimated in money." I have already dealt with the difference between a benefit actually received and a benefit lost, but subject to that difference, that is undoubtedly an expression of opinion by Cotton, L.J., that the fact that a company has paid with full knowledge of the facts does not debar them from requiring a subsequent account on the footing of a benefit which they knew of and had not dealt with in account when they paid. I do not myself see any principle upon which that exception or limitation could be placed unless they had so acted as to be estopped, and to make it inequitable for them to insist upon the position, which they must, by their conduct as between themselves and their assured, be deemed to have abandoned.—p. 655

[The decision in Leeds v. Cheetham is not accepted as law by Lord St. Leonards, who, in his Handy Book on Property Law, p. 101, 1st edit., p. 109, 6th edit., says to the landlord "if, however, you have insured, although not bound to do so, and received the money, you cannot compel payment of the rent, if you decline to lay out the money in rebuilding"]

CAMPBELL, C.J.—With regard to the opinion expressed by Lord St. Leonards, his book is a most valuable publication, and I pay respect to it; if it were proposed to make it law, I might be ready to support it; but it is only the opinion of a most learned judge, and it is contrary to a solemn decision, and to my own opinion.—p. 720.

COTTON, L.—If there had been no authority on the point, the matter would have possibly been more doubtful, but in several cases interest has been allowed on payments made both under express and implied contracts to indemnify. In Petre v. Duncombe, under a covenant by way of indemnity to a surety, interest was allowed by way of damages upon payments which had been made by the surety, it being held that on a contract to indemnify the person to be indemnified should be put in the same position as if the man who had contracted to indemnify him had in fact done what he had contracted to do, that is, had paid the money at the proper time. And Kinderley v. C., in a very careful judgment in Hitchman v. Stewart, came to the same conclusion where there was only an implied contract by co-sureties to indemnify or repay another co-surety the amount which he had paid in excess of his fair proportion. There the Vice-Chancellor allowed interest, on the ground that there was an implied contract to indemnify, following the old case of Lewson v. Wright (1 Cox 275), where the point does not appear to have been argued, but interest was allowed under somewhat similar circumstances. That decision of Vice-Chancellor Kinderley's has been followed in the recent case of In re Swan's Estate, where the Court of Appeal in Ireland allowed interest under similar circumstances on the same principle on an implied contract to indemnify. Having regard to these authorities, and to the consideration that where there is a contract to indemnify, express or implied, the person who is to be indemnified ought to be put in the same position as if the act against which he is to be indemnified had been done by the person who is to indemnify him at the time when it ought to have been done, we are of opinion that the proof for interest ought to be admitted.—p. 421

HALL, V.-C.—The case of Mackintosh v. Great Western Railway Co. would seem to be an authority independently of the statute. Stuart, V.-C., however, did not in his judgment as to interest refer to the cases which I have already mentioned, but he seems to have gone on some earlier authorities which, in the cases to which I referred, were reviewed and considered to be no longer applicable at law. Under all the circumstances of that case, and treating the question as one of legal right, I do not consider that case is an authority in favour of the plaintiffs for the allowance of interest. The case of Mildmay v. Methuen was referred to. I do not consider that the decision in that case is satisfactory, or one which ought to guide me in coming to a conclusion in this case; if, independently of it, I should come to a different conclusion, which, under all the circumstances of this case, I certainly should come to. The circumstances of that case are not set forth, and there is nothing to explain what the nature of the deduction was. but even supposing that I could treat the present as a case within the 28th section, I do not find that that section is imperative. It merely empowers a jury, if "they shall think fit," to allow interest at a rate not exceeding a certain amount. Those words give a discretion to the jury to say whether the case is, under all the circumstances of it, one in which interest ought to be allowed or not. A new trial would not, I think, be granted, because the jury had not allowed interest under that section.—p 560

GROVE, J.—It was argued by Mr. Moir, and the argument is partly supported by the reasoning of Hall, V. C. in Hill v. The South Staffordshire Railway Co., that to constitute a demand within the statute (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28), the sum demanded must be specified in the notice. I agree with my lord in thinking that there are no words in the statute to support that argument.—p. 668.

LORD CHELMSFORD, L. C.—The argument before us in support of the demurrer has been chiefly rested upon the case of the Colombian Government v. Rothschild, and it has gone the length of maintaining that by the rules of procedure in Chancery a foreign republic is unable to institute a suit for the recovery of its own property in its own name, and being pressed to state in what manner the United States of America are to sue in our Courts, the counsel for the defendants said the only proper mode was in the name of their President. That, however, was not the view of Wood, V. C. (L. R. 3 Eq. 124) (p. 686). It was insisted that the case of the Colombian Government v. Rothschild, which was approved of by the House of Lords, had settled this question in defendants' favour. That case, however, seems to have proceeded upon grounds which render it wholly inapplicable to the purpose for which it was cited. The bill was filed in the name of the Government of the State of Colombia, and its advocates, Don Manuel José Hurtado, described as a citizen of the said State and Minister Plenipotentiary from the same to the Court of His Britannic Majesty, with the addition of his residence. The bill having been demurred to, the Vice-Chancellor, Sir John Leach, allowed the demurrer. Now I do not understand this to be a decision that the State of Colombia could not be plaintiffs in a suit instituted for the recovery of the property of the State, much less that they could not sue unless they appointed some public officer, having himself no interest in the subject in litigation, to represent their rights. The Vice-Chancellor, by the words, "It must sue in the names of some public officers who are entitled to represent the interests of the State," must have referred to some persons or body in whom the interests of the State were vested, and who were, therefore, entitled to represent it in a suit. There was nothing upon the face of the bill to indicate whether the Government of Colombia was such a body, or, indeed, of whom it was composed, so that if the defendants had been desirous of filing a cross bill, they would have been wholly unable from information contained in the original bill to know upon whom process should be served.—p. 588

STIRLING, J—It [Lindo v Belisario] was the first case in which the validity of a Jewish marriage was considered by an Ecclesiastical Court. In dealing with it Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott) said: "This is a case which comes—modern knowledge of that law." That language would not have been inappropriate if the question before him had related to the capacity of the contracting parties as well as to the formalities of the marriage. In fact, however, the question related to the formalities only. It was one of intricacy and difficulty, and I am unable to find anything in the judgment which indicates that the observations to which I have referred were directed to anything beyond that which the learned judge was called on to decide; certainly I cannot look on them as an authority for the proposition that the capacity of members of the Jewish faith to contract marriage is regulated by their own law and not by the law of this country. The question in Reg v Millis [(1844) 10 Cl & F 534; 8 Jur 717.—H.L. (12)] See "HUSBAND AND WIFE," supra, col 1195] was also one of form, and to it the remarks of Lord Brougham (see p 796) and Lord Campbell (see p 794), cited in argument, appear to have been addressed—pp 723, 724.

CORTON, L J [for the Court]—It only remains to consider the case of Simonin v Mallac. The objection to the validity of the marriage in that case, which was solemnized in England, was the want of the consent of the parents required by the law of France, but not under the circumstances by that of this country. In our opinion, this consent must be considered a part of the ceremony of marriage, and not a matter affecting the personal capacity of the parties to contract marriage; and the decision in Simonin v Mallac does not, we think, govern the present case—p 7

STIRLING, J—Those decisions [Johnson v Johnson's Administrator and Connolly v Woodrick] are not, of course, binding upon me, but they are entitled to most respectful consideration.

I am not sure that the learned judges who decided those cases took the same view of the law as is expressed by Lord Penzance, by which I consider myself to be bound; but in both cases the facts were very different from those in the present case, and circumstances were proved which might, in my judgment, well lead to the conclusion, consistently with the doctrine laid down in Hyde v Hyde and Woodmansee, that the marriages there under consideration were valid according to the law of England.

LINDLEY, M.R.—That brings me to the second point . . . that is the question whether this settlement has become binding on this lady or not. She was an Irish lady. The settlement was executed at Bernin Switzerland and in the English language and with English trustees in the British Embassy, and it was executed previous to and in contemplation of her marriage with an Austrian gentleman. It was contemplated that after marriage they should, as they did, go and live in Austria.—In other words, that she should become domiciled in Austria. Now, according to the English law this settlement by her was a voidable contract in the sense explained by the H. L. in Edwards v. Carter, to which I will refer presently. She lived two or three years in Austria, and then became of age—twenty-one. By the Austrian law she was unable to ratify this contract or to confirm it or to place it out of her power to revoke it, and now we have to consider the consequences that arise. The position is simply that this lady never had either before or after marriage power to make an irrevocable settlement. Can we hold, therefore, that this settlement has become irrevocable? That is the paradox that is put to us. Cozzens-Hardy, J. has taken this view of it. He says, first, that upon the authority of Van Grutten v. Digby this was an English settlement to be governed by English law, and by the English law as expounded by the H. L. in Edwards v. Carter. . . covenants in a marriage settlement or a settlement made on the marriage by infants are voidable, and become binding unless repudiated within a reasonable time. It is said that she always had power at all events to repudiate, and that she could do that by Austrian law, and that the English law cannot be applied to that state of things, and that inasmuch as she has not repudiated within a reasonable time this contract has become irrevocable. To my mind that is not sound reasoning. For, in the first place, as regards Van Grutten v. Digby, the point we have to consider did not arise for discussion or determination. There was no question there about capacity to contract. It was a settlement made by people of mature age, binding upon them when made, and Lord Romilly was clearly right in saying that this was a contract which was to be decided according to the law of England regardless of any change of domicile afterwards. But here we are faced with a difficulty which arises from the capacity to contract, and that difficulty does not appear to me to be touched, and still less governed, by the decision in Van Grutten v. Digby.—p. 511

LORD CRANWORTH.—Now, whatever be the difficulties in such cases as the present, I think the doctrine that no divorce in Scotland resting merely on a forum domicilii, had, at all events before the passing of our English Divorce Act in 1857, any effect in England on the validity of an English marriage, is established on the highest authority. It is impossible to have a stronger authority for this than the case of Lolley, for it was decided there by the twelve judges that by the second marriage he was guilty of bigamy, though on general principles every leaning in a criminal case would be in favour of the party accused. That case was followed by Dr. Lushington in Conway v. Beazley (3 Hag. Ecce Rep 639).

There, as in the present case, the second marriage was had in Scotland, not, as in Lolley's Case, in England. . . and it was attempted on that ground to distinguish the two cases. But Dr. Lushington held that the principle was the same wherever the second marriage was solemnized, for that, as neither of the parties to the first marriage had been, at any time, bona fide domiciled in Scotland, the principle of Lolley's Case must prevail.—p. 70

LORD WESTBURY. . . Lolley's Case was, without question, rightly decided, but it does not involve the conclusion that the judges held the Scotch decree of divorce of no effect because an English marriage was indissoluble by English law. There are other and legitimate grounds of decision to which the judgment in Lolley's Case may, and in my opinion ought, to be referred. Throughout the Scotch proceeding the domicile of both parties was in England, and the residence in Scotland was temporary only, and intended only for the purpose of having a suit for divorce instituted. The judge, therefore, was not the judge of the domicile; the suit was not bona fide, and the whole proceeding was in fraud of English law, and injurious to English interests. It has been supposed that Lolley's Case was recognised by Lord Eldon in the case of Tolby v. Lindsay (1 Dow 117), which came before this House in 1813. But on an examination of the judgments in that case in Dow's Reports, it will be seen that one main difficulty felt by Lord Eldon as to the validity of the Scotch divorce arose from the circumstances of the parties not being domiciled in Scotland at the time of the decree. So Dr. Lushington, in the case of Conway v. Beazley, appears to have thought that the true ground of the invalidity of the decree of divorce in Lolley's Case was the fact of the parties not being domiciled in Scotland at the time — p. 85.

SERBOENE, L. C. — It is said that Lord Brougham in the case of McCarthy v. Deceux, decided that because the solemnisation of the marriage with an English woman had taken place in England, therefore the Danish Court could not, under these circumstances, dissolve the marriage. I have all due respect for the judicial decisions of all who have at any time filled the office of Lord Chancellor. I have great respect for the high reputation of Lord Brougham, but I am compelled to speak without much respect of the decision in McCarthy v. Deceux, not only because it seems to me to proceed upon a view of Lolley's Case which is not really tenable, but also because it is a decision which, upon principles universally recognised, would be incapable of being supported even if it were true that the English Court ought not to have recognised that Danish divorce; because, beyond all doubt on that supposition both the husband and the wife lived and died domiciled in Denmark and the distribution of both their personal estates would by a law which is beyond controversy, fall to be regulated in England and everywhere by the law of Denmark and not by the law of England and, therefore, unless it had been ascertained that the law of Denmark under those circumstances would not distribute those estates in the same manner as if there had been a valid divorce the decision manifestly lost sight of the true question in the case. I do not, therefore, think it necessary to say more about the case of McCarthy v. Deceux — p. 52.

LORD HALSBURY, L C.—I should think that, in order to be binding on your lordships, a previous decision must be in principle, and, as applicable to the same circumstances, identical, and it appears to me that the case by which the M R thought himself bound (Lashley v Hog) is quite distinguishable both in principle and in circumstances. To omit other questions, the cardinal distinction between the French and the Scottish law is not, I think, without an important bearing upon the very question in debate, and I think it may be stated shortly thus. If the wife by the marriage in Scotland acquired no proprietary rights whatever, but only what is called a hope of a certain distribution upon the husband's death, it is intelligible that that right of distribution, or by whatever name it is called, should be dependent upon the husband's domicile, as following the ordinary rule that the law of a person's domicile regulates the succession of his movable property. But if by the marriage the wife acquires, as part of that contract relation, a real proprietary right, it would be quite unintelligible that the husband's act should dispose of what was not his; and hence, I think, is to be found the key to Lord Eldon's judgment. He says, "The true point . . . to do intestate." It will be observed that the whole point of what Lord Eldon argues is that the whole of the property, apart from express contract, is absolutely and entirely the husband's, and that, as by law he can dispose of it as he will, it is not unreasonable that he should be at liberty to do something which by its legal effect will change what I think are inaccurately described as what would have been the rights of the wife if no change had taken place, because in substance she has, until the husband's death, no rights at all. Doubtless it is true that, according to the authorities on Scottish law, the right of the wife is no right at all in its strict sense. When speaking of the ius mariti it is described as a legal assignation to the husband, and in commenting on this authority, the late Mr Finlay, while at the Scottish Bar, in his book on the "Law of Husband and Wife" (2nd ed.), vol 1, p 677, says: "At a very early period . . . that fell under common law." How different the position of the wife is under the French law is sufficiently indicated, in contrast to the above extract, by

sect. 1444 of the Code Civil. And if the propositions are put shortly—that the wife acquires no proprietary rights by marriage under the Scotch law at all, but under the French law acquires a real proprietary right, the distinction between the two systems is evident enough. The communio bonorum in Scotland is a mere fiction. In France it is a reality, and in England, as the M R says, the parties to the litigation now being discussed, Mr and Mrs. Hog, were both English, married in England, where her unsettled property, existing and after-acquired, became the property of Mr Hog by the mere fact of the marriage, and gave Mrs Hog no proprietary right whatever to the movable property in question. Once it is admitted that the marriage gives a proprietary right (and therein is the importance of the distinction Lord Eldon took between what was inaccurately argued in that case as a proprietary right conferred by the fact of marriage, and a real proprietary right conferred by specific contract), the anomaly pointed out by the M R, and sought to be explained, becomes at once intelligible. It is only material as illustrating what was the prevailing train of thought in the minds of Lord Eldon and Lord Rosslyn. Both of them speak of the words "implied contract," by which I presume they mean implied from the relation of husband and wife, and not unnaturally they deduce the conclusion that if it is implied from that relation only, the husband's change of domicile may bring with it the consequential change from such relation. Here, however, as I have endeavoured to point out, the French marriage confers not only an implied, but an actual binding partnership proprietary relation fixed by the law upon the person of the spouses, the binding nature of which, it appears to me, no act of either of the parties contracting marriage can affect or qualify. I can only account for the absolutely inaccurate use of the Scottish term ius relictæ as arising from a reference to a dispute that appears to have existed in the Scottish authorities as to whether those rights flowed from the communion, whereas, to quote again from Mr Fraser's book, p 671, he says "It has been found . . . before them." It is for this reason, as I understand that, when once Lord Eldon came to the conclusion that the husband and wife had become Scottish domiciled spouses, the property not affected by a previous complete and irrevocable right would properly be distributed according to Scottish law. It follows, therefore, if I am right, that that case is not binding on this House, and that we are at liberty to decide the question now in dispute in accordance with reason and common sense—pp 112—111

LORD WESTBURY—In advising to Mr. Justice Story's work, I am obliged to dissent from a conclusion stated in the last edition of that useful book, and which is thus expressed: "The result of the more recent English cases seems to be that for a change of national domicile there must be a definite and effectual change of nationality." In support of this proposition the editor refers to some words which appear to have fallen from a noble and learned lord in addressing this House in the case of Moorhouse v. Lord, when in speaking of the acquisition of a French domicile, Lord Kingsdown says, "A man must intend to become a Frenchman instead of an Englishman." These words are likely to mislead, if they were intended to signify that for a change of domicile there must be a change of nationality, that is, of natural allegiance. That would be to confound the political and civil status of an individual, and to destroy the difference between patria and domicilium—p. 459.

JAMES, v. c.—The law in this case is very clearly laid down in the judgment of Lord Westbury in the case, to which I have been referred on both sides of Udny v. Udny in the House of Lords. He says (p. 458), "Domicil of choice is a conclusion or inference which the law derives from the fact of a man fixing voluntarily his sole or chief residence in a particular place, with an intention of continuing to reside there for an unlimited time. This is a description of the circumstances which create or constitute a domicile, and not a definition of the term. There must be a residence freely chosen and not prescribed or dictated by any external necessity, such as the duties of office, the demands of creditors, or the relief from illness; and it must be a residence fixed not for a limited period, or for a particular purpose, but generally, and indefinite in the future contemplation. It is true that residence originally temporary, or intended for a limited period, may afterwards become general and unlimited, and in such a case, so soon as the change of purpose, or animus manendi, can be inferred, the fact of domicile is established." That is the rule as laid down by Lord Westbury. In substance it is the same as the rule laid down in the same case by the Lord Chancellor, and differs but slightly, I think, from the rule as laid down by Lord Selwyl. I agree that it must be considered as differing from the rule as laid down in what may be called the intermediate class of cases in the Exchequer v. In re Capdevielle, Attorney-General v. Countess de Wahlstatt; following the decision in the House of Lords, Moorhouse v. Lord, in which, if I may use the expression, that unfortunate dom. civile patriam was introduced, as if it were a question of nationality, and not of more or less permanence of residence. It does differ from these cases, but it differs in bringing back the law to that which (in my opinion) was always, before those cases, considered to have been the law, and evidently is the law as laid down by the treatise writers, viz., that domicile was to be considered as changed whenever there was a change of residence of a permanent character voluntarily assumed—p. 460.

WICKENS, v. c.—It is universally, or all but universally, true, that in order to prove that the domicile of an adult of sound mind has been changed, an intention on his part must be shown. The question on which opinion has been differed is as to what he must be shown to have intended. According to one view it is sufficient to show that he intended to settle in a new country, to establish his principal or sole and permanent home there, though the legal consequences of so doing, on his civil status, may never have entered his mind. According to the other view, it is necessary to show that he intended to change his civil status, to give up his position as, for purposes of civil status, a citizen of one country, and to assume a position as for the like purposes, the citizen of another. This stricter view is supported by opinions of great weight, amongst others, by the Lord President, in Donaldson v. McClure, that of the Lord Chief Baron Pollock in Attorney-General v. Countess de Wahlstatt, and by some expressions used by the late Lords Cranworth and Kingsdown. . . . And cases like Haldane v. Eckford, where the change of civil status can be shown to have been recognised and accepted by a person who had no special reason to deny, and probably did not desire it, are very rare indeed. The stricter rule would therefore, in the very great majority of cases, leave the domicile to be governed by origin, which, it seems to me, would be in every respect a convenient view. But I cannot satisfy myself that the stricter rule, as I have called it, can be considered as the law of England (p. 613).

• KEKEWICH, J.—There are two cases, Crichton's Trust, In re, in the Court of Chancery, and Ferguson's Trust, In re, decided by the M.R. in Ireland—where the infants were Scotch. In each case the infant had reached the age of puberty, and though not having attained his majority and not exi juris in England or Ireland, yet it was proved that the infant was competent to give a discharge in Scotland. That of itself may make a difference, and . . . in the Irish case it was proved that security was given for the due performance of his duties respecting the fund by the curator in Scotland. That seems to me to make a considerable difference. From the other cases I do not think I can get much assistance. In Boyes's Trust, In re, no doubt the V.-C. made the order. The petitioner adduced evidence to show that by the law of Prussia he was entitled, in his capacity of guardian of the infant, to receive the fund and administer it during the infant's minority—which is exactly what the petitioner says here—and the V.-C., on hearing the evidence, made the order. What further evidence there was, or what influenced his judge, it is extremely difficult to say. It is a very short note of an unopposed petition to which there was no respondent; and I do not think it is a case which can be relied upon as establishing the principle. Then Hellmann's Will, In re, is still further from doing so.—p. 352.

FRANKSON, J.—The other case is that of Black- wood v. The Queen, in the Privy Council. The judgment was given by Sir Arthur Hobhouse, he says, "It does not appear . . . as is shown by the cases of Proctor v. Proctor (2 Drew. 286)." I think you may take an slight exception to the language of that I do not think Sir Arthur intended to say that in every country where a deceased man may have left assets they are to be distributed so as to give the creditors of that country priority, or that he means to assert that in Ireland, for instance, an Englishman who had been trading with an Irish merchant would not have as great a right to be paid pari passum as anyone else, but whatever the law in France or India may be, the law of England has always been that you must enforce claims in this country according to the practice and rules of our Courts, and according to them a creditor, whether from the furthest north or furthest south, is entitled to be paid equally with other creditors in the same class. I must refuse to alter that which has always been the law of this country, and which I must say, for the sake of honesty, I hope will always be the law of this country. I may add, that there seems to be some mistake in the case of Wilson v. Lady Dunsany, it is unfortunate that the case was ever reported

CHELMFORD, L.O.—The case of Talleyrand v. Boulanger was cited to show that a party has no right to avail himself of a foreign law which gives him a better remedy than he could be entitled to in the place where the cause of action arises. But that case has really no application [The Lord Chancellor then stated the facts] Lord Loughborough said [in Talleyrand v. Boulanger]. "I am not prepared to say how far this Court will finally give redress, but I will not allow the defendant to avail himself of any advantage got by duress which is the sole cause of the new engagement." There was, however no duress in the case in the legal sense of that word, for, although the law of France would not have allowed an arrest, yet the plaintiff was entitled to avail himself of all the remedies which the law of this country afforded him for the recovery of the debt. This very point was decided between two foreigners in the case of De la Vega v. Vianna, where Lord Tenterden said "A person suing in this country must take the law as he finds it. He cannot, by virtue of any regulation in his own country, enjoy greater advantage than other suitors here, and he ought not, therefore, to be deprived of any superior advantage which the law of this country may confer;" and in the case of Don v. Lippmann, Lord Brougham, in advising the House, said "The law on this point is well settled in this country, where this distinction is properly taken, that whoever relates to the remedy to be enforced must be determined by the lex fori, the law of the country to the tribunals of which the appeal is made." The proceedings of the plaintiff in Talleyrand v. Boulanger might have been hush, but they were not contrary to law, and, therefore, there was no more duress in the case than there would be in the case of a person lawfully arrested giving a bail bond to the sheriff to obtain his discharge out of custody. A Court of law would not, under the circumstances (as the Lord Chancellor supposed), have discharged the defendant upon common bail. For this the case already mentioned of De la Vega v. Vianna is a direct authority. I do not, therefore, see how equity could properly interfere to restrain the actions which, however oppressive, as Lord Loughborough thought them, arose out of remedies enforced by the plaintiff for the recovery of his debt, of which the law entitled him to avail himself.—p. 186.

 KELLY, D.B., said that he thought the law was well laid down by his brother Blackburn in the above case.

ARMILLET, D.—As laid down by my brother Blackburn, in Schibasy v Westenholz, if he is a subject of the country or owes it a qualified allegiance as by residence, he will be bound by the law and procedure of the country, or if he has selected the tribunal himself, or perhaps, if at the time of the contract the defendant was in the foreign country, although I agree with my brother Blackburn that this last proposition requires consideration—p. 660

WYLLIE, J.—Then arises the question how far the defendant is bound by it [a decision of a foreign Court], and the law upon this point, I think, I may conveniently take from the case of Schibasy v Westenholz, which has been so much discussed in the course of the argument. In that case, the Court considered the principles on which foreign judgments are enforced by Courts of this country, and they said (at p. 169), "We think for the reasons there given . . . is a defence to the action." What are the circumstances which have been held to impose upon the defendant the duty of obeying the decision of a foreign Court? Having regard to that case, and to Cogh v Adamson (L. R. 9 Ex. 345), they say, I think, he stated thus Courts of this country consider the defendant bound where he is a subject of the foreign country in which the judgment has been obtained, where he was resident in the foreign country when the action began, where the defendant in the character of plaintiff has selected the forum in which he is afterwards sued; where he has voluntarily appeared; where he has contracted to submit himself to the forum in which the judgment was obtained, and, possibly, if Dreghet v MacCuthy (2 B & Ad 951) be right, where the defendant has really stayed within the foreign jurisdiction, in respect of which the cause of action arose whilst he was within that jurisdiction—p. 370

R. 161), the judges of which, whilst affirming the judgment of Wills, J. on the point of law which was raised as to the effect of the appearance by the defendant, reversed it as to the particular facts of the case.]

WILLS, J.—In 1870, there was the case, which has been so much discussed, of Schibasy v Westenholz. Mr Justice Blackburn, in delivering the judgment of the Court, sums up what he conceives to be the result of the authorities. I do not know that I should go further into this part of the question, except for the fact that undoubtedly there seems to me to have been a misapprehension, in the course of that judgment, as to what had been decided by some of the cases which were under review. Inasmuch as it is very desirable to clear away any misapprehension of that sort, I think it is only right I should point out how it is that, as it appears to me, there was misapprehension as to what was decided in the cases of The General Steam Navigation Co v. Guillon and De Cassa Brasao v. Rathbone, respectively. The learned judge says, after citing the passage from the case of The General Steam Navigation Co v. Guillon, which I have already read, "It will be seen from this that those very learned judges, besides expressing an opinion conformable to ours, also expressed one to the effect that the plaintiffs in that suit did not put themselves under an obligation to obey the foreign judgment merely by appearing to defend themselves against it. On the other hand, in Singapore v. Poon (1 Hen. & M. 135, 32 L. J. Ch. 249), where the mortgages of an English ship had come into the Courts of Louisiana to endeavour to prevent the sale of their ship seized under an execution against the mortgagors, and the Courts of Louisiana decided against them, the Vice-Chancellor and the very learned counsel who argued in the case seem all to have taken it for granted that the decision of the Court of Louisiana would have bound the mortgagors had it not been in contemptuous disregard of English law" (that is to say, the Court there, professing to deal with English law, had correctly stated what they believed to be English law, and then decided against it, although it was said, according to all legal principles, which they admitted, it ought to be decided by English law). "The case of The General Steam Navigation Co v. Guillon was not referred to, and therefore cannot be considered as dissented from, but it seems clear that they did not agree in the latter part of the opinion there expressed." I have pointed out already that the case of De Cassa Brasao v. Rathbone was cited and relied upon, and in that case The General Steam Navigation Co v. Guillon was under discussion, and therefore, although it is not specifically mentioned in the report of the argument, in that sense it is dissented from, because the judgment which had really dissented from it, and which cannot be considered as anything else than a formal judgment dissenting from it, had been followed and approved. The judgment goes on to say, "We think it is better to leave this question open, and to express no opinion as to the effect of the appearance of a defendant, where it is so far not voluntary that he only comes in to try to save some property in the hands of the foreign tribunal." Now, certainly, unless I misunderstand that sentence in its connection with what goes before, it seems rather to point to the view, that in the case of Simpson v Fogo and in the case of The General Steam Navigation Co v Guillon in each of those cases the defendant had appeared to try to save some property in the hands of the foreign tribunal, and it was decided one way by one decision and the other by the other. I cannot find in the pleadings in The General Steam Navigation Co v Guillon that there was any allegation of that kind, and it seems to me, as far as one can gather from the pleadings in The General Steam Navigation Co v Guillon that that was a case, as far as it appears, of a purely voluntary appearance, and under no compulsion or duress, or anything of that kind. "But we must observe," the judgment goes on to say "that the decision in De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone is an authority that where the defendant voluntarily appears and takes the chance of a judgment in his favour, he is bound." I cannot help thinking with Mr. Abrahams, that in that phraseology the voluntary appearance which is attributed to the case of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone really means an appearance voluntary as contradistinguished to one made under that species of duress which consists of the necessity of attempting to save your property from execution if you do not appear at all. Whereas, as I have pointed out, in the case of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone the allegation in the plea was that the defendant had property in France which he wished to save from possible execution and therefore for that reason he appeared. Therefore, it seems to me rather, if the decisions in the case of The General Steam Navigation Co v Guillon and that of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone had been misapplied, and the decision which was really that of the latter case attributed to the former, and that of the former case attributed to the latter. If so, it seems to me to be incorrect to say that that particular question was at that time still undecided, because it seems to me that it is impossible to distinguish the case of De Cosse Brissac v Rathbone from the present case, and that it is impossible to deny that in this case it was expressly alleged that the appearance of the defendant was not to save property then in the hands of the tribunal, but, what is newly as cogent a species of duress, from the necessity of saving other property from execution in case a judgment by default should be obtained in the Court. It seems to me, therefore, that that question really in the year 1870 was not an open question, and it is not an open question now as far as decisions go—p 524.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The case of Day v. Carr has been relied on in opposition to the rule, and seems in point. However much I may regret that this Court should differ from a decision of the Court of Exchequer, I am bound to say that I cannot assent to the doctrine there laid down. BOWEN, L.J.—Martin, B., said (in Winter v. Bartholomew). "The case of Holler v. Laurie seems to me to proceed on the fallacy that there are two rights of action against the sheriff, one for entering the house, and another for seizing the goods; whereas in truth there is but one right of action in respect of the whole transaction, and, as to that, the Interpleader Act enables the Court to stay proceedings. Such has been the constant practice. If, indeed, the sheriff, in the execution of the writ, has committed any real grievance, the Court will allow the injured party to bring an action, but if he has done no real wrong, the Court will stay proceedings against him." It seems to me impossible not to say that the decision in Winter v. Bartholomew has displaced Holler v. Laurie, except so far as that case may be treated as distinguishable on the ground on which it was distinguished in Winter v. Bartholomew—p. 881.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Where it is doubtful whether the security is sufficient to pay off the second creditor or not, what is the right course to take in that case? The proper course in such a case is for the Court to say, "Unless you, the execution creditor, will guarantee the secured creditor loss by sale, we will not order a sale." Here the execution creditor and the trustee have declined to redeem, and declined to give any guarantee at all against any loss in the case. Upon the evidence, I do not think that a sale would realise sufficient to pay off the bill of sale altogether. Under these circumstances, how can it be just to enforce a sale and deprive him of his security? It would be an abuse of the rule [Order 67, rule 12] not to put it into operation in a case to meet which it was passed. It is said that this view is opposed to a decision of this Court in Forster v. Clowser. I do not think so at all. It appears to me perfectly consistent with it. What the C.A. did there was this. They were satisfied that there was enough to pay off the bill of sale holder that which they considered was the sum properly payable to him. I think the Court went a long way in anticipating the date of payment. That is nothing. I am satisfied they never would have deprived him of his security. What they did was this. They were satisfied there was enough to pay principal and interest and costs, in their judgment, according to what they thought was right, they were satisfied, in other words, that upon the sale, and the payment to him in full of what they thought he was entitled to, there would be a surplus left for the execution creditor. That is quite a different case — pp. 861, 862.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—I cannot conceal from myself that in thus holding that the relative position of mortgagee and mortgagor does not give a title to the debtor to file a bill of interpleader I may be disregarding the authority of Fenn v Edmunds; but, with all respect to Sir J. Wigram, I must say, if the case is fully and accurately reported, it is one that I cannot follow. It appears to me to proceed on the assumption that assignees in bankruptcy are bound to be active in confirming a prior assignment made by the bankrupt, if called on for the purpose by the person who has to pay, or, if not, that they may be treated as setting up a claim to what has been assigned. I can find no warrant for such a doctrine; it is, in truth, a further assurance which is asked for, and which, except by reason of a special contract, no one is bound to make. I collect from the note of Wood, V.C.'s judgment that he entertained great doubt as to the decision in Fenn v Edmunds.—p. 988.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The only case at all in favour of the plaintiffs is Crawshay v. Thornton. That was a case of a bill of interpleader filed under the practice formerly existing in the Court of Chancery, and it is unnecessary to consider whether it was correctly decided, for in the cases before us the summonses were issued under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 58, and, as I have before intimated, the facts appear to fall precisely within the words of that statute. But I wish also to remark that Crawshay v Thornton was decided before the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 12, and, from my own knowledge, as one of the Common Law Commissioners, I can say that it was intended to do away with the effect of that decision.—p. 455.

WILLS, J. (for self and GRANTHAM, J.)—The substance of this decision [Carne v Brice] is that the execution creditor, having a title prima facie lawful, can only be defeated by a person showing a better title of some sort, and that the trustees of the wife's settlement, not being in possession, and having no title themselves, could not give themselves title by showing that someone else had a title superior to that of both themselves and the execution creditor. Let the execution creditor and that person settle the question between themselves.—p. 136

MATHW, J.—But there is a distinction between this case and that of Richards v Jenkins, which prevents its application, for at the time when the execution creditor executed the bill of sale to the grantee she had an equity of redemption in them [the goods], and under that later bill of sale the equity passed to the claimant, so that he was entitled to come forward and say to the sheriff that he claimed the goods. The sheriff could not sell as against McCulloch, the mortgagee, and the claimant had the equity of redemption in the goods. Now in Richards v Jenkins there was absolutely no title in the claimant. That differentiates the two cases.—p. 12

CAYE, J.—The sole point to be decided is the meaning of Ord. L.A. 12 of the County Court Rules, 1830, and the question is whether the costs in this case come under the scale of costs above 50l. as the learned judge of the County Court has found, or not. The value of the goods is found by the learned judge to be 51l., and he awarded 10l. as damages. These sums make together the sum of 61l., and on that sum the learned judge has given the claimant costs on the scale above 50l. I do not see how he could have done anything different. It appears, however, that the execution creditor relies upon Brown v. Lilley. I need not distinguish it from the present case because it is no authority whatever upon the construction of Ord. L.A. r. 12; the portion of the judgment relied on by the execution creditor is a mere obiter dictum, not having anything to do with the point decided. It is clear that the claimant cannot stop when he has proved his title to the goods up to the value of the amount paid into Court. The true test is the value of the whole of the goods seized and claimed by him, and it was therefore necessary for the claimant to go on and prove not only that the goods were of the value of 51l., the sum paid into Court but that the whole of the goods belonged to him. This he did, and

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court)—It remains for us, however, to notice a case, which certainly is not distinguishable from it, and which must therefore, if its authority be adopted, determine the present Lord Killybeg is reported to have held at Nis Prius in Jackson v. Athrill, that the price of spirituous liquors sold by the agent of a liquor merchant on his account, to the keeper of an eating-house in quantities under the value of 20s. was recoverable notwithstanding the statute, and the ground of the decision is stated to have been that he "thought this case did not fall within the mischief intended to be remedied by this Act of Parliament, the intent of which was to prohibit the sale of such small quantities to the consumer," that "the liquors were not sold to the defendant for his own consumption, but for the use of guests resorting to his house in the way of his trade, and, therefore, in his lordship's opinion, not within the Act of Parliament."

It now becomes our duty, after argument and upon deliberation (the absence of which circumstances so much impairs the authority of a Nisi Prius decision, whatever weight may be justly due to the opinion of the preponderant judge, to give one construction upon this statute. The preamble certainly alludes to the mischief noticed by Lord Kenyon, the increase of immoderate drinking of spirituous liquors by persons of the lowest sort: which is attributed, in a great measure, to the description of persons who had obtained licenses to retail the same, and to those who had presumed to retail the same without any licence. And accordingly, the first eleven sections of the Act are directed to the object of putting these persons under better and more strict regulations. Then comes the 12th section, upon which the question turns, and which has been already quoted. Now that the prohibition is, in terms, of all sales of spirituous liquors to a less amount than 20s., it is impossible to doubt, and to introduce an exception not there to be found, and which, if intended, might have been so easily introduced and expressed is, we think, to entail null and abridge the meaning of plain words in a manner which no rule of construction, of which we are aware, warrants.

We have purposely deferred noticing the language of Lord Tenterden in giving the judgment of the Court in the last cited case of Buryniel v. Hutehinson (5 Barn & Ald 241), which is to the following effect. . . .

We agree to this construction, and think we ought to adopt it. The consequence is that our judgment must be for the defendant—p. 300

HAWKINS, J.—It has been argued that this matter might have been the subject of an appeal to sessions and that, therefore, mandamus is not the proper remedy. Perhaps that might have been so if the judgment of the Court had been announced to her, and in that case we should probably have refused to make this rule absolute. But how is an applicant, who does not know the grounds upon which a decision is given, and who denies to appeal to the sessions, to frame her notice of appeal when she does not even know what she is appealing against? All that was said was "Rex judicata," and the licence was refused. Was it refused because the house was frequented by disorderly persons, or because the applicant was not the real owner of the house—or on what ground was it refused? I really cannot see how she could appeal against such a decision as this. The circumstances here appear to me sufficiently to distinguish the case from Reg. v. Smith, for here the magistrates' society (I do not use the word offensively) avowed that the licence should be refused, and did not, as it seems to me, hear and determine the application according to law. The whole case on both sides must be presented to them, and they will then be in a proper position to adjudicate upon it.—pp 142, 148.

FIELD, J.—In that case the tenant of premises in respect of which a licence had been previously granted applied for a renewal, on the ground that the previous tenant had neglected to apply at the general sessions for the licence to be renewed, and that under sect 14 of 9 Geo 4, c 61, it was open to the justices, whose the previous tenant had neglected to apply, to grant the renewal. In the present case, however, there is no ground for claiming the benefits of sect. 14, which apply only to cases of neglect or wilful omission on the part of the previous occupier. The appellant is seeking to read into sect. 15 [of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49] the provisions of sect. 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828, which apply to an entirely different set of circumstances. Under the latter section [sect. 15], when a licensed person has, by reason of a conviction for felony, become personally disqualified or had his licence forfeited, application may be made by or on behalf of the owner of the premises to a Court of summary jurisdiction for authority to carry on the business on the premises "until the next special sessions for licensing purposes," when a further application for the grant of a licence must be made. If the Legislature had intended that all the provisions of sect. 14 of Geo. 4, c. 61, should apply, they would have said so, but though certain procedure of sect. 14 is adopted, sect. 15 of the Act of 1874 expressly limits applications to the "next special sessions for licensing purposes," and not to any special sessions, as under sect. 14 of the Act of 1828—p. 169.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—We decided Reg. v. Market Bosworth JJ. [56 L. J. M. C. 96] upon facts exactly like the present. We decided it upon the authority of Reg. v. Liverpool JJ., and our decision has never been questioned. If the matter were res integra, I should probably not decide as I am deciding, but in a matter of this kind it is very important to abide by former decisions, and as the applicant in the present case was in the position in which McGrath would have stood, we are bound to follow the decision of the C.A., and to hold that the justices were wrong. They ought to have followed the decision in Reg. v. Liverpool JJ., and should have heard the appellant when he applied for a renewal of the licence.—p. 47.

 WATSON, HERSCHELL, SHAND and DAVEY
 LORD HERSCHELL.—It is said that the effect of the provision contained in the (Summary Jurisdiction) Act, 1884 (sect. 7), was to make the

that the words "conviction or order" are not even used as meaning the decision that a conviction shall take place or an order be made, but refer to the conviction and order themselves, in their technical sense. The refusal to grant a licence may be regarded as a decision of the licensing justices, but what is the "order" founded thereon? Sub-sect. d, in my mind, puts the matter beyond doubt. No allusion was made sect. 31 of the Act of 1879, which limits the operation of that section to persons entitled to appeal from the "the conviction or order" of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. It seems to have been assumed by the learned judges that if the licensing justices were a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, it necessarily followed that all appeals from these decisions came within the terms of and were regulated by the provisions of sect. 31. I do not think so.

An applicant to whom a licence is refused has undoubtedly by the Act of 1828 a right of appeal, for that statute confers on him a right to appeal from "any act" of the licensing justices.
 But can it be said that he is thereby authorised to appeal from a "conviction or order?" The appeal authorised is certainly not one from a "conviction;" is it an appeal from an "order?"
 Even if I had to construe the language of the introductory part of sect. 31 alone, without the light thrown upon it by the subsequent provisions, my answer must be in the negative.

Sect. 31 forms part of an Act to amend the law relating to the summary jurisdiction of magistrates. What is meant by the summary jurisdiction of magistrates is, of course, perfectly well understood by every lawyer, and in relation to that jurisdiction the words "conviction" and "order" have a well defined meaning. The conviction follows on an information, the order on a complaint. When the licensing justices grant an application for a licence they sign a certificate by means of which the licence is obtained. But where they refuse the application they make no order at all. They simply do not grant the licence applied for. An order is never drawn up, and to speak of the act of the justices in not granting a licence as an order would be, I think, a misuse of the term. When the other provisions of sect. 31 are examined the matter becomes even clearer. The first sub-section prescribes that the appeal must be made to the next quarter sessions holden not less than fifteen days "after the day on which the decision was given, upon which the conviction or order was founded," thus showing point of law, may require a case to be stated.

 The words "determination or other proceeding" are here added, indicating that every determination of justices was not regarded as comprised in the word "order."

I have not yet referred to sub-sect. 2 of sect. 31, which was much discussed in the argument at the Bar. That sub-section prescribes that the appellant shall give notice of appeal to "the other party." There is no difficulty in applying this provision in cases where magistrates exercise summary jurisdiction as commonly understood.
 Where proceedings are taken by way of information or complaint which end or may end in a conviction or order, there are always two parties
 —the person instituting the proceedings and the person against whom the proceedings are taken.
 It has been held that, where the appeal is against the refusal to grant a licence, a person who has objected to the grant of the licence before the licensing justices is "the other party" within the meaning of sect. 31. No doubt, if it be assumed that the section includes such a case
 the words "the other party" could not very well apply to any one else. But, to me, the provision for notice to the other party is an additional reason for thinking sect. 31 inapplicable to appeals against the refusal of justices to grant a licence. Persons objecting to the grant of a licence are not, I think, parties to the proceedings on the application in any proper sense of the term. The question is not one inter partes at all. The justices have an absolute discretion to determine, in the interest of the public, whether a licence ought to be granted, and every member of the public may object to the grant on public grounds, apart from any individual right or interest of his own. The applicant seeks a privilege. A member of the public who objects merely informs the mind of the Court to enable it rightly to exercise its discretion whether to grant that privilege or not. A decision that a licence should not be granted is a decision that it would not be for the public benefit to grant it.
 It is not a decision that the objector has a right to have it refused. It is not, properly speaking, a determination in its favour. It is, I think, a fallacy to treat the refusal as necessarily induced by a particular objector. Every member of the local community might object. Would they all then become "the other party"? There is, in truth, no lis, no controversy inter partes, and no decision in favour of one of them and against the other, unless, indeed, the entire public are regarded as the other party, for if a licence be refused on the ground that it was not needed to supply the legitimate wants of the neighbourhood, the decision is really in favour of the public at large. The provision contained in sub-sect. 2 seems to me an additional reason for holding that an appeal from the "act" of the justices in refusing a licence is not an appeal from a conviction or order of a Court of summary jurisdiction.

I see no inconvenience in such a conclusion, quite the reverse. It is said that the object of sect. 31 was to introduce uniformity of procedure in appeals to quarter sessions. A laudable object, and calculated to be useful when applied to a class of cases similar in their character. But there does not appear to me to be any reason for straining the language of sect. 31 so as to make it embrace a very different class of cases provided for by special legislation. That legislation has never been expressly repealed, and I do not think it has been repealed by necessary implication, for an enactment which regulates appeals against a "conviction or order" of a Court of summary jurisdiction, does not, in my opinion, conflict with an enactment which prescribes the method and conditions of an appeal against "any act" of the licensing justices.

The Court of Appeal arrived at the conclusion that they did in the Glamorganshire case and in the present case because they felt bound to attribute to the words of the definition clause their natural meaning. I have been guided by the same principle in interpreting the language of sect. 31 of the Act of 1879, which seems to me to have been somewhat lost sight of.

Although the views I have expressed involve the decision that Reg. v. Glamorganshire JJ was wrongly decided, they do not necessarily conflict with the judgment in Reg. v. Forty-spool JJ, in which it was held that the licensing justices were bound under sect. 33 of the Act of 1879 to state a case for the opinion of the Court. That section, as I have already pointed out, entitles an aggrieved party who desires to question any "determination" of a Court of summary jurisdiction as erroneous in point of law to have a case stated. And a decision not to grant a licence is undoubtedly a "determination" of such Court if the licensing justices are a Court of summary jurisdiction. Though it is not necessary to decide this point, I feel bound to say that, as at the present advised, I am not satisfied that the conclusion arrived at on this point in the Courts below is a sound one. Looking at the scope of the Act of 1879, at the fact that sect. 7 of the Act of 1884 purports to be declaratory and not enacting, and that it is difficult to suppose that it was intended to enact that every justice when doing any act under any authority which he possesses is a Court of summary jurisdiction, my present impression is that the enactments defining a Court of summary jurisdiction may well be construed as meaning no more than this—that every justice is a Court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Act of 1879, or any other law relating to summary jurisdiction, in all matters pertaining to the exercise of summary jurisdiction by magistrates, however he may have derived his authority to exercise that jurisdiction—p 792—798.

KENNEDY, J.—A question has been raised as to the power of the Court to award costs to the respondent who appears here as the successful opponent of the rule aux; for the mandamus being made absolute. The Court has always exercised its discretion in such cases, but the discretion has generally been exercised in favour of granting costs to a successful respondent if he is such a person as the Court deems to be entitled to appear by reason of his interest in the matter before the Court. The decision of the H. L. in Boulter v. Kent JJ does not appear to have interfered with such discretion. This is not the case of a successful appellant to quarter sessions asking for an order that the objector who has not appeared on the appeal should pay the costs of the appeal. In the present case we have a party opposing who has appeared, has been heard, is interested, and has asked for his costs in respect of his opposition to the application to this Court. We think that the respondents were justified in appearing, and the order of the Court is that they be allowed their costs—p 283.

CHANNELL, J.—It is obviously convenient that the matter should be treated by certiorari. We are bound by the decisions in Boulter v. Kent JJ, [66 L. J. Q. B. 787, (1897) A. C. 556] and Reg. v. Sharma, but a section in the Licensing Act, 1872, has been pointed out, which applies to this case, and distinguishes it from those decisions. It was pointed out by counsel for the prosecutor that, under sect. 43 of the Act of 1872, the objector is expressly made a party to the proceedings before the confirming authority, and that that authority has power to award costs to the successful party. That seems to me sufficient to dispose of the point that this was not a judicial proceeding inter partes, and a rule for a certiorari as to the decision of the confirming authority must therefore be made absolute.—p 360.

COLERIDGE, O.J.—The only case cited for the appellant which raises any difficulty in my mind is that of Mullins v. Collins, where, however, I observe the late Mr Justice Atchulbald says that he does not intend in any way to interfere with the maxim that before a person can be criminally convicted he must be shown to have a mens rea. But the true effect of that case may, I think, be summed up by saying that since the judgment was in affirmance of a conviction. The justices had heard the whole case, and had the witnesses before them, and they had come to the conclusion on the facts that the appellant had been guilty of an offence. It may be observed that it is stated in the case that the appellant called no witnesses, but relied entirely on certain points of law, and it may be that the justices thought under the circumstances of that case that, as the appellant would not raise any affirmative case on his own behalf, he had none to raise, and the merits were in truth against him, and that they

SMITH, L.J.—That case was decided upon the view that licensing justices were a Court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but the basis of that decision has been swept away by the judgment of the House of Lords in Boulter v Kent JJ where it was held that licensing justices are not a Court of summary jurisdiction, and that sect. 31 of that Act did not apply.—p 578 consent to admit very much as weight as an authority for the proposition that the magistrates would have been wrong under such circumstances in refusing to convict, and that this Court ought, if they had so refused, to have sent back the case to them with the opinion of the Court that they ought to convict, for that is what we are asked to do here.—p 362.

STEPHEN, J.—There the peculiar fact was that the appeal was against an acquittal, the justices having held that the respondent was entirely ignorant of the gambling, and the servant who it was proved did know was only a potman and not in charge of the premises. There was, therefore, no delegation of authority, and the case did not therefore come within the principle of the former cases, and the Court dismissed the appeal. That case seems to me not to conflict, but to be in accordance with the other cases. The L.C. distinguished the case from Mullins v Collins, on the ground that in that the servant was in charge and knew, or was wilfully blind; while in Somerset v Hart the potman merely knew of it as a fact, but not in discharge of his duty, nor being in charge at the time.—p. 108

COOKBURN, CJ (during the argument)—The word "place" in sect. 15 (3 & 4 Vict. c 61) must be something analogous to a parish. The dictum of Erle, J., in Reg v Charlesworth, was ex-judicial, for the hamlet of G was also part of the parish of Kirkburton, which contained more than 25,000 inhabitants, and, therefore, the appellant was entitled to keep his house open until 11 o'clock, whatever was the right construction of the word "place" in sect. 15.

KEATING, J.—I am unable to distinguish this case from Taylor v Humphries. It has been strongly pressed upon us, that, inasmuch as the report of that case in the Law Journal makes no mention of sect 14 of the 11 & 12 Vict c 43, and the Lord Chief Justice does not allude to it in his judgment, we ought to assume that the attention of the Court was not called to it, and therefore we ought not to hold ourselves bound by that decision. Looking, however, at the report in 17 C B (N.S.) we can entertain no doubt that that provision was distinctly brought to the attention of the Court, and was present to the mind of the Chief Justice when he prepared the judgment. Not only was the statute referred to, but a case of Tenant v Chamberland (23 J P 51), where it was held that the burthen of proof lay upon the innkeeper, was cited. Taylor v Humphries, therefore, must stand unless we can see clearly that it proceeded upon a mistake. I agree with Mr White as to the serious consequences which may ensue from our pronouncing a decision which may have the effect of repealing the proviso in question. The Court has no intention to do so upon the present occasion. Neither did Erle, CJ, in Taylor v Humphries intend to do anything of the kind. All the Court there intended to decide was that under the peculiar words of the statute then under consideration, that which appeared to be an exception was in truth not an "exemption, exception, proviso, or condition," within the proviso in sect 14 of Jervis's Act, 11 & 12 Vict c 43. And I think a contrary decision would cast upon the innkeeper an intolerable burthen; for he would then be precluded from supplying refreshment to any person whom he did not personally know. Under these circumstances I think it right to adhere to the decision in Taylor v Humphries—p. 176

WILLS, J.—We were pressed with the case of Stretch v White. One would have expected that so important a case would be found in the regular reports. I can hardly believe that if the regular reports. I do not think it is a satisfactory report. There was no considered detailed judgment. I cannot help thinking that there was a sale and a transmutation of property when the butter was set aside at the farmer's residence for delivery. If so, it is no authority binding upon us. I do not think the decision as reported in the Justice of the Peace at all satisfactory, and we are therefore at liberty to decide this case upon the plain words of the statute. Upon the words of the statute I cannot entertain any doubt at all—p 237.

ORANWORTH, L. C.—I am bound to say that I do not at all feel confident that the case in Bridgman would be so decided at the present day. The other authority cited, an old case in the 2nd Volume of Reports in Chancery, is exceedingly loosely reported, and if it means that which Mr. Walker contends it means, as very likely it does, all I can say is that it is inconsistent with what has been taken to be the state of the law in the subsequent cases—p 520.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L. J.—If it be necessary to give any opinion on that case, I confess that, on examining it, I find it difficult to distinguish that case from the present satisfactorily. . . . On looking at the judgments I prefer that of Erle, J., to that of the other three judges on this point (i.e. equitable mortgage). . . . It seems to me, with great deference to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in that case, that sufficient attention was not paid to the distinction between the existence of the trusts and the remedy against the trustee.—pp. 532, 533.

The Lord Chancellor (in Bruce v. Oxford) endeavored to distinguish Watts v. Porter, but, if not distinguishable, it was dissented from. It was also commented on and disapproved of by Turner, J., I concur in the decision of Beavan v. Oxford, and consider that the decision in Watts v. Porter cannot govern the present case.—p 544.

WOOD, V. O.—Even if the charging order had been made absolute before notice of the mortgage, it would be impossible for me to give priority to the charge of the judgment creditor without disregarding the dicta in Beavan v Oxford (Earl) (4 De G. M. & G. 521, 525, 582), in inference to the decision of the Court of Q.B. in Watts v Porter. It is true they are but dicta, for the facts in Beavan v Oxford (Earl) are distinguishable from the present case; the charge there being a charge on land. Nevertheless they are the dicta of a superior Court, and Lord Cranworth expressly and decidedly preferred the view taken in Watts v Porter by Erie, J., which is in accordance with that I have adopted, to the decision of the other learned judges, by whom that case was decided in a contrary manner. Turner, L.J. goes somewhat further, resting his decision upon an opinion directly contrary to that which was adopted in Watts v Porter. He says, in effect, that, in principle, the two cases could not be distinguished (that there was a distinction is clear, because in Watts v Porter, as here, the charge was upon personality, whereas in Beavan v Oxford (Earl) it was on real estate), and he concurs with Lord Cranworth, in giving a decided preference to the opinion of Erie, J. over that of the other judges. My judgment coincides with that of Erie, J. and . . . I must hold that, as against the mortgages in this case, no lien was acquired by the charging order, that order having been made after the execution of the mortgage.—p. 683.

Watts v Porter, questioned.

WILLIAMS, J.—The opinion of the majority of the Court in Watts v Porter created an exception on the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, to the rule which applies generally, and which was applied in this Court more than a hundred years ago in the case of the statutory execution under the bankrupt law, that the creditors can have no more than the debtor was entitled to at law as well as in equity. But, since the cases of Beavan v Lord Oxford and Kinderley v Jervis, it is open to grave doubts whether the opinion of Erie, C.J., in Watts v Porter was not the more correct one.—p. 251.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—I am aware that the Master of the Rolls seems to have taken a different view of the subject in his recent case of Shaw v. Neale. It does not, however, appear that the Irish case (Hickson v Collis) was brought under the consideration of his honour.

This was a decision at variance with what Lord St. Leonards stated in Hickson v. Collis, and which seems to me more in unison with the spirit and language of the enactment than the construction adopted by his honour. It does not appear to have been pointed out in argument that the provisions of the statute never could be complied with as to mortgages complete before the re-registration. It is impossible to re-register within five years previously to the date of the deed creating a mortgage prior to the re-registration.—p. 503

WOOD, V.C.—In re Perrin was a very different case. It was a question of construction of a statute upon words which seem so plain that I am not surprised that Lord St. Leonards said he had no doubt upon the point, and only reserved his judgment as to how far the previous statute, 6 Will. 4, c. 14, had affected the question. By that statute it was enacted, that a judgment creditor who had obtained a judgment by confession, should be in the same position in bankruptcy as a simple contract creditor. There was an Irish Act which included in one clause several things which are more distributed in the corresponding Act relating to this country, and gave certain rights to the judgment creditor, and in that Act, after giving a judgment the effect of a charge upon land, this provision occurs:—"nor shall such charge operate to give the judgment creditor any preference in case of the bankruptcy of the person against whom such judgment shall have been entered up, unless such judgment shall have been entered up one year at least before the bankruptcy; provided also, that, as regards purchases, mortgages, or creditors who shall have become such before the time appointed for the commencement of the Act, such judgment shall not affect lands, tenements, or hereditaments otherwise than as the same would have been affected by such judgment if this Act had not been passed;" and the very case had arisen of creditors under a bankruptcy, which was the case contemplated by the first part of the clause which I have read. The judgment creditor claimed to have certain rights in respect of a bankrupt's property, and urged that the simple contract creditors had no right to oppose, because the word "creditor" must be taken to mean persons who were, like himself, in the position of judgment creditors. Lord St. Leonards said that was not so, for the preceding clause dealt with the case of creditors in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy was a statutory execution for the benefit of all the creditors by simple contract or otherwise equally, including judgments registered within a year before the bankruptcy and judgments obtained by confession. Any claim of priority by such judgment creditor was the mischief intended to be prevented. The Act provided, that every judgment creditor must register his judgment within a year before the bankruptcy; and, as to creditors before the passing of the Act, judgments were not to affect lands at all. The statute did not indicate in this case, to the conclusion that the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, providing that an unregistered judgment shall be void against lands in respect of creditors, can only mean to refer to creditors having an interest in the lands. It provides that the judgment shall be void unless the judgment creditor re-registered it within five years before the creditor's right accrued. That must be the right of the creditor in that thing, in respect of which, unless the re-registration is made, the judgment is to be void—that is to say, "lands, tenements, and hereditaments." In so deciding, I construe the statute in the mode which the preceding words render necessary, as Lord St. Leonards did regard to the statute which he had to consider in the case I have referred to—p. 70.

MARTIN, B. (delivering the judgment of the Court).—We have been pressed by the authority of this case (Slater v. Mackay). In that case the application was for the costs of an action on a judgment, and as the defendant had pleaded to that action and tria revocata, the Court of Common Pleas considered that that circumstance enabled them to exercise a discretion under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 16, s. 4, and that the proper course was to give the plaintiff his costs. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is entitled to the greatest respect, and we have considered it accordingly, but cannot understand it. The question in those cases is, as the bringing an action in the judgment is an evasion of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57? And how that can be effected by the defendant pleading a false plea to the action we cannot see; although certainly, if we could give the plaintiff his costs on a judgment obtained after a false plea had been pleaded by his adversary, we would do so. As an authority on the other side, we have Bell v. Walden, where Wrightman, J., obviously considered that if a party is guilty of an evasion of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, the Court is bound not to give him costs; and in that case he refused to do so. For these reasons we think that we shall best exercise the jurisdiction we possess in refusing to give costs in the present instance—p. 204.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I dissent from the opinion expressed by the Court of Exchequer that the discretion which was vested in the Courts by 4 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 4, to order that the plaintiff should have his costs in an action brought upon a judgment, is taken away by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57—p. 184.

CAVE, J.—Reg. v. Meyer (infra), was not cited there [in Reg. v. Gibbon], and the Court does not advert to the distinction established by that case between a substantial interest likely to cause a real bias and the mere possibility of a bias. Still we might have felt ourselves bound by the decision in that case had it not been that in White v. Redfern (reported, but not on this point, in 5 Q B D 15) the same question arose, and was decided the other way. Feeling ourselves thus at liberty to exercise our own judgment in the matter, we are of opinion that in cases like the present, where such a section as sect. 502 of this local Act exists in order to disqualify the justice, it must be established that he has such a substantial interest in the result of the hearing as to make it likely that he has a real bias in the matter.—p. 386.

 COLBRIDGE, C.J.—Two distinctions have been pointed out to us which, in my opinion, separate the case before us from those cited. In those cases there was no substantive preliminary proceeds by the defendants, but here there was a protest . . . There is, however, a second distinction . . . arising out of the special provision as to time for proceedings enacted by sect. 10 of the [Sale of Food and Drugs] Act of 1879 . . . Here, therefore, is a condition precedent to the trial of the offence, carefully securing to a person charged, in respect of a perishable article, an opportunity of defending himself. It appears to me that this limit of time prescribed by the Act cannot be disregarded—pp 118, 119.

MELLOCK, J.—It is difficult to put a consistent construction on the first and second sections, but I think the provision which allows a summons to be left at a person's most usual place of abode must have been intended to apply to such a case as that of a tradesman or labourer, or, as in the case which has been cited (Re Williams), of a man working in a mine who would return home at regular intervals, and not to a case where a man might very likely be away for a week or ten days at a time. It cannot be supposed that it was intended to apply to a case like the present

Rex v. Wilson (1835) 3 A. & E. 817.—K. B., DENMAN, C. J.—In Rex v. Elwell a conviction very like the present was brought before the Court and quashed. The objection was that imprisonment was awarded till fine paid, and no fine set. The form of that conviction is copied into Burn's Justice from the third volume of Lord Raymond, and was contradicted by my brother Patteson, in Rex v. Oakley (4 B. & Ad. 307), with that which was then held bad on another ground. It was thence inferred that he approved of the form in Rex v. Elwell in every other particular; but surely no mode of arguing can be less just.—p 828.

Reg. v. Chaney (1838) 6 D. P. C. 281.
PATTERSON, J.—I . . . have looked at the case of Rex v. Taylor, and without at all meaning to say that what is there decided is not good law, yet it is not an authority binding upon me, because the Court merely said there that they would not look at defects in a commitment until they had before them the conviction itself; and when it was brought before them, it appeared to be as defective as the commitment, and therefore the defendants were discharged. It is not, therefore, an authority to show that a party cannot be discharged on the ground of an error in the commitment.—p 289.

KELLY, C.B.—The prisoner is therefore entitled to his discharge, and my only doubt was caused by the case of Rex v. Taylor, where upon the authority of an old case (Rex v. Haichin, 4 Fortescue 272; Abbott, C.J. says, "We must suppose, until the contrary is shown, that there is a legal conviction to support the commitment. We must have the conviction brought up before we can take any notice of a defect in the warrant," and adds, "for this purpose you may have a certificate to bring up the record and views of habeas corpus to bring up the defendants." There, on the conviction being afterwards brought up, the prisoner was discharged. But that case is no authority for the present one. Here the habeas corpus has already been granted and the prisoner is brought up under it, and is, with the return, before the Court; and we cannot deal with it as if it were merely an application for a writ made upon matter shown by affidavits.—p. 260
